plain language of the § 106.30 definition does not state that a supportive measure provided to one party cannot impose any burden on the other party; rather, this provision specifies that the supportive measures cannot impose an unreasonable burden on the other party. Thus, the § 106.30 definition of supportive measures permits a wide range of individualized services intended to meet any of the purposes stated in that provision (restoring or preserving equal access to education, protecting safety, deterring sexual harassment).

We do not believe that it would be appropriate to specify, list, or describe which measures do or might constitute ''unreasonable'' burdens because that would detract from recipients' flexibility to make those determinations by taking into the account the specific facts and circumstances and unique needs of the parties in individual situations.[801] For similar reasons, we decline to require that supportive measures be ''proportional to the harm alleged'' and constitute the ''least burdensome measures'' possible, because we believe that the § 106.30 definition appropriately allows recipients to select and implement supportive measures that meet one or more of the stated purposes (e.g., restoring or preserving equal access; protecting safety; deterring sexual harassment) within the stated parameters (e.g., without being disciplinary or punitive, without unreasonably burdening the other party). The ''alleged harm'' in a situation alleging conduct constituting sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30 is serious harm and the definition of supportive measures already accounts for the seriousness of alleged sexual harassment while effectively ensuring that supportive measures are not unfair to a respondent; even if a supportive measure implemented by a recipient arguably was not the ''least burdensome measure'' possible, in order to qualify as a supportive measure under § 106.30 the measure cannot punish, discipline, or unreasonably burden the respondent.

To the extent that commenters are advocating for wider latitude for recipients to impose interim suspensions or expulsions of respondents, the Department believes that without a fair, reliable process the recipient cannot know whether it has interim-expelled a person who is actually responsible or not. Where a respondent poses an immediate threat to the physical health or safety of the complainant (or anyone else), § 106.44(c) allows emergency removals of respondents prior to the conclusion of a grievance process (or even where no grievance process is pending), thus protecting the safety of a recipient's community where an immediate threat exist. The Department believes that the § 106.30 definition of ''supportive measures'' in combination with other provisions in the final regulations results in effective options for a recipient to support and protect the safety of a complainant while ensuring that respondents are not prematurely punished.[802]

In response to commenters' concerns that omission of the word ''equal'' before ''access'' in the § 106.30 definition of supportive measures creates confusion about whether the purpose of supportive measures is intended to remediate the same denial of ''equal access'' referenced in the § 106.30 definition of sexual harassment, we have added the word ''equal'' before ''access'' in the definition of supportive measures, and into § 106.45(b)(1)(i) where similar language is used to refer to remedies. The Department appreciates the opportunity to clarify that whether or not a recipient has implemented a supportive measure ''designed to effectively restore or preserve'' equal access is a fact-specific inquiry that depends on the particular circumstances surrounding a sexual harassment incident. Section 106.44(a) requires a recipient to offer supportive measures to every complainant irrespective of whether a formal complaint is filed, and if a recipient does not provide a complainant with supportive measures, then the recipient must document the reasons why such a response was not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances under § 106.45(b)(10)(ii).[803]

In order to ensure that the definition of supportive measures in § 106.30 is read broadly we have also revised the wording of this provision to more clearly state that supportive measures must be designed to restore or preserve equal access to education without unreasonably burdening the other party, which may include measures designed to protect the safety of parties or the educational environment, or deter sexual harassment. The Department did not wish for the prior language to be understood restrictively to foreclose, for example, a supportive measure in the form of an extension of an exam deadline which helped preserve a complainant's equal access to education and did not unreasonably burden the respondent but could not necessarily be considered designed to protect safety or deter sexual harassment.

The Department was persuaded by the many commenters who requested that the Department expand provisions that incentivize and encourage supportive measures. As previously noted, we have revised § 106.44(a) to require recipients to offer supportive measures to complainants. As explained in the ''Proposed § 106.44(b)(3) Supportive Measures Safe Harbor in Absence of a Formal Complaint [removed in final regulations]'' subsection of the ''Recipient's Response in Specific Circumstances'' subsection of the ''Section 106.44 Recipient's Response to Sexual Harassment, Generally'' section of this preamble, we have eliminated the proposed safe harbor regarding supportive measures altogether and, thus, we do not extend this safe harbor to elementary and secondary schools. As all recipients (including elementary and secondary school recipients) are now required to offer complainants supportive measures as part of their non-deliberately indifference response under § 106.44(a), the proposed safe harbor regarding supportive measures is unnecessary. The Department agrees that the need to offer supportive measures in the absence of, or during the pendency of, an investigation is equally as important in elementary and secondary schools as in postsecondary institutions. The final regulations revise the § 106.30 definition of supportive measures to use the word ''recipient'' instead of ''institution'' to clarify that this definition applies to all recipients, not only to postsecondary institutions.

[801] The recipient must document the facts or circumstances that render certain supportive measures appropriate or inappropriate. Under § 106.45(b)(10)(ii), a recipient must create and maintain for a period of seven years records of any actions, including any supportive measures, taken in response to a report or formal complaint of sexual harassment and must document the basis for its conclusion that its response was not deliberately indifferent. Specifically, that provision states that if a recipient does not provide a complainant with supportive measures, then the recipient must document the reasons why such a response was not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances. Thus, if a recipient determines that a particular supportive measure was not appropriate even though requested by a complainant, the recipient must document why the recipient's response to the complainant was not deliberately indifferent.

[802] Section 106.44(c) (governing the emergency removal of a respondent who poses an immediate threat to any person's physical health or safety); § 106.44(d) (permitting the placement of non-student employees on administrative leave during a pending grievance process).

[803] See discussion in the ''Section 106.44(a) Deliberate Indifference Standard'' subsection of the ''Section 106.44 Recipient's Response to Sexual Harassment, Generally'' section of this preamble.

To preserve discretion for recipients, the Department declines to impose additional suggested changes that would further restrict or prescribe the supportive measures a recipient may or must offer, including requiring supportive measures that ''do'' restore or preserve equal access rather than supportive measures ''designed'' to restore or preserve equal access. Requiring supportive measures to be ''designed'' for that purpose rather than insisting that such measures actually accomplish that purpose protects recipients against unfair imposition of liability where, despite a recipient's implementation of measures intended to help a party retain equal access to education, underlying trauma from a sexual harassment incident still results in a party's inability to participate in an education program or activity. To the extent that commenters desire for the final regulations to specify that certain populations (such as international students) may have a greater need for supportive measures, the Department declines to revise this provision in that regard because the determination of appropriate supportive measures in a given situation must be based on the facts and circumstances of that situation. Supportive measures must be offered to every complainant as a part of a recipient's response obligations under § 106.44(a).

The Department declines to include an explicit statement that schedule and housing adjustments, or removals from sports teams or extracurricular activities, do not unreasonably burden the respondent as long as the respondent is not separated from the respondent's academic pursuits, because determinations about whether an action ''unreasonably burdens'' a party are fact-specific. The unreasonableness of a burden on a party must take into account the nature of the educational programs, activities, opportunities, and benefits in which the party is participating, not solely those educational programs that are ''academic'' in nature. On the other hand, the Department appreciates the opportunity to clarify that, contrary to some commenters' concerns, schedule and housing adjustments do not necessarily constitute an ''unreasonable'' burden on a respondent, and thus the § 106.30 definition of supportive measures continues to require that recipients consider each set of unique circumstances to determine what individualized services will meet the purposes, and conditions, set forth in the definition of supportive measures.[804] Removal from sports teams (and similar exclusions from school-related activities) also require a fact-specific analysis, but whether the burden is ''unreasonable'' does not depend on whether the respondent still has access to academic programs; whether a supportive measure meets the § 106.30 definition also includes analyzing whether a respondent's access to the array of educational opportunities and benefits offered by the recipient is unreasonably burdened. Changing a class schedule, for example, may more often be deemed an acceptable, reasonable burden than restricting a respondent from participating on a sports team, holding a student government position, participating in an extracurricular activity, and so forth.

The final regulations require a recipient to refrain from imposing disciplinary sanctions or other actions that are not supportive measures, against a respondent, without following the § 106.45 grievance process, and also require the recipient's grievance process to describe the range, or list, the disciplinary sanctions that a recipient might impose following a determination of responsibility, and describe the range of supportive measures available to complainants and respondents.[805] The possible disciplinary sanctions described or listed by the recipient in its own grievance process therefore constitute actions that the recipient itself considers ''disciplinary'' and thus would not constitute ''supportive measures'' as defined in § 106.30. If a recipient has listed ineligibility to play on a sports team or hold a student government position, for example, as a possible disciplinary sanction that may be imposed following a determination of responsibility, then the recipient may not take that action against a respondent without first following the § 106.45 grievance process. If, on the other hand, the recipient's grievance process does not describe or list a specific action as a possible disciplinary sanction that the recipient may impose following a determination of responsibility, then whether such an action (for example, ineligibility to play on a sports team or hold a student government position) may be taken as a supportive measure for a complainant is determined by whether that the action is not disciplinary or punitive and does not unreasonably burden the respondent. Certain actions, such as suspension or expulsion from enrollment, or termination from employment, are inherently disciplinary, punitive, and/or unreasonably burdensome and so will not constitute a ''supportive measure'' whether or not the recipient has described or listed the action in its grievance process pursuant to § 106.45(b)(1)(vi).

The Department reiterates that a recipient may remove a respondent from all or part of a recipient's education program or activity in an emergency situation pursuant to § 106.44(c) (with or without a grievance process pending) and may place a non-student employee respondent on administrative leave during a grievance process, pursuant to § 106.44(d).[806] Further, a recipient is obligated to conclude a grievance process within a reasonably prompt time frame, thus limiting the duration of time for which supportive measures are serving to maintain a status quo balancing the rights of both parties to equal educational access in an interim period while a grievance process is pending.

With respect to supportive measures in the elementary and secondary school context, many common actions by school personnel designed to quickly intervene and correct behavior are not punitive or disciplinary and thus would not violate the § 106.30 definition of supportive measures or the provision in § 106.44(a) that prevents a recipient from taking disciplinary actions or other measures that are ''not supportive measures'' against a respondent without first following a grievance process that complies with § 106.45. For example, educational conversations, sending students to the principal's office, or changing student seating or class assignments do not inherently constitute punitive or disciplinary actions and the final regulations therefore do not preclude teachers or school officials from taking such actions to maintain order, protect student safety, and counsel students about inappropriate behavior. By contrast, as discussed above, expulsions and suspensions would constitute disciplinary sanctions (and/or constitute punitive or unreasonably burdensome actions) that could not be imposed without following a grievance process that complies with § 106.45. The Department emphasizes that these final regulations apply to conduct that constitutes sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, and not to every instance of student misbehavior.

[804] The 2001 Guidance at 16 takes a similar approach to the final regulations' approach to supportive measures, by stating that it ''may be appropriate for a school to take interim measures during the investigation of a complaint'' and for instance, ''the school may decide to place the students immediately in separate classes or in different housing arrangements on a campus, pending the results of the school's investigation'' or where the alleged harasser is a teacher ''allowing the student to transfer to a different class may be appropriate.''

These final regulations do not expressly require a recipient to continue providing supportive measures upon a finding of non-responsibility, and the Department declines to require recipients to lift, remove, or cease supportive measures for complainants or respondents upon a finding of non-responsibility. Recipients retain discretion as to whether to continue supportive measures after a determination of non-responsibility. A determination of non-responsibility does not necessarily mean that the complainant's allegations were false or unfounded but rather could mean that there was not sufficient evidence to find the respondent responsible. A recipient may choose to continue providing supportive measures to a complainant or a respondent after a determination of non-responsibility. This is not unfair to either party because by definition, ''supportive measures'' do not punish or unreasonably burden the other party, whether the other party is the complainant or respondent. There may be circumstances where the parties want supportive measures to remain in place or be altered rather than removed following a determination of non-responsibility, and the final regulations leave recipients flexibility to implement or continue supportive measures for one or both parties in such a situation.

The Department also declines to add an additional requirement that schools implement a process by which supportive measures are requested by the parties and granted by recipients, because we wish to leave recipients flexibility to develop processes consistent with each recipient's administrative structure rather than dictate to every recipient how to process requests for supportive measures. Although we do not dictate a particular process, these final regulations specify in § 106.44(a) that the Title IX Coordinator must promptly contact the complainant to discuss the availability of supportive measures as defined in § 106.30, consider the complainant's wishes with respect to supportive measures, inform the complainant of the availability of supportive measures with or without the filing of a formal complaint, and explain to the complainant the process for filing a formal complaint. Complainants will know about the possible supportive measures available to them [807] and will have the opportunity to express what they would like in the form of supportive measures, and the Title IX Coordinator will take into account the complainant's wishes in determining which supportive measures to offer. The final regulations do prescribe that a recipient's Title IX Coordinator must remain responsible for coordinating the effective implementation of supportive measures, so that the burden of arranging and enforcing the supportive measures in a given circumstance remains on the recipient, not on any party. We acknowledge commenters' concerns that these final regulations place many responsibilities on a Title IX Coordinator, and a recipient has discretion to designate more than one employee as a Title IX Coordinator if needed in order to fulfill the recipient's Title IX obligations.[808]

With respect for a process to remove a respondent from a recipient's education program or activity, these final regulations provide an emergency removal process in § 106.44(c) if there is an immediate threat to the physical health or safety of any students or other individuals arising from the allegations of sexual harassment. A recipient must provide a respondent with notice and an opportunity to challenge the emergency removal decision immediately following the removal. Additionally, the grievance process in § 106.45 provides robust due process protections for both parties, and before imposition of any disciplinary sanctions or other actions that are not supportive measures as defined in § 106.30, against a respondent, a recipient must follow a grievance process that complies with § 106.45.

We acknowledge commenters' concerns regarding the provision in the § 106.30 definition supportive measures that the Title IX Coordinator must coordinate the effective implementation of supportive measures. However, we believe it is important that students know they can work with the Title IX Coordinator to select and implement supportive measures rather than leave the burden on students to work with various other school administrators or offices. The Department recognizes that many supportive measures involve implementation through various offices or departments within a school. When supportive measures are part of a school's Title IX obligations, the Title IX Coordinator must serve as the point of contact for the affected students to ensure that the supportive measures are effectively implemented so that the burden of navigating paperwork or other administrative requirements within the recipient's own system does not fall on the student receiving the supportive measures. The Department recognizes that beyond coordinating and serving as the student's point of contact, the Title IX Coordinator will often rely on other campus offices to actually provide the supportive measures sought, and the Department encourages recipients to consider the variety of ways in which the recipient can best serve the affected student(s) through coordination with other offices while ensuring that the burden of effectively implementing supportive measures remains on the Title IX Coordinator and not on students.

Changes: We have revised the definition for supportive measures in § 106.30 to refer to ''recipients'' instead of ''institutions'' which clarifies that the definition of supportive measures is applicable in the context of elementary and secondary schools as well as in the context of postsecondary institutions. We have added ''equal'' before ''access'' in the description of supportive measures designed to restore or preserve equal access to the recipient's education program or activity. We have revised the second sentence of this provision to clarify that supportive measures must be designed to restore or preserve equal access and must not unreasonably burden the other party, which may include measures also designed to protect safety or the recipient's educational environment, or deter sexual harassment.

No-Contact Orders

Comments: Several commenters focused on the list of possible supportive measures included in the definition of supportive measures in § 106.30 and viewed the express inclusion of mutual no-contact orders as a general prohibition on one-way no-contact orders, and asked the Department to clarify whether one-way no-contact orders were prohibited. Other commenters assumed one-way no-contact orders were prohibited, and expressed concern that by disallowing one-way no-contact orders, the onus would be placed on the victim to take extreme measures to provide for their own accommodations and prevent victims from getting the support they needed, or would discourage victims

[807] Section 106.45(b)(1)(ix) requires the recipient's grievance process to describe the range of supportive measures available to complainants and respondents. Additionally, the Title IX Coordinator must contact an individual complainant to discuss the availability of supportive measures, under § 106.44(a).

[808] See discussion in the ''Section 106.8(a) Designation of Coordinator'' subsection of the ''Clarifying Amendments to Existing Regulations'' section of this preamble.

from reporting in the first place. Many commenters asserted that a victim would be forced to face or interact with their alleged harasser in class, in dorms, or elsewhere on campus if one-way no-contact orders were prohibited. Other commenters argued that a victim would have to win an administrative proceeding in order to be granted a one-way no-contact order. Many commenters called for the Department to remove the ''mutual restrictions on contact'' provision from the list entirely because it is not a victim-focused supportive measure. Additionally, some commenters expressed the belief that mutual no-contact orders are not enforceable because it is hard to determine which party has the burden to comply with the no-contact order if both parties are present in the same location. A few commenters believed that mutual no-contact orders would constitute unlawful retaliation against the victim since such an order would necessarily restrict the victim's own participation in programs or activities as well as the participation of the respondent. Some commenters argued that mutual no-contact orders were contrary to the public policies underlying VAWA and various State laws, and that mutual no-contact orders are analogous to reciprocal protective or restraining orders, which have been invalidated by at least one State Supreme Court.[809]

Other commenters asked the Department to expand the list in the § 106.30 definition of supportive measures to include a greater variety of allowable supportive measures. Some commenters argued that the list of possible supportive measures only included prospective measures (that might preserve access going forward) as opposed to remedial measures (that might restore access that had already been lost), and argued that the Department should explicitly mention measures aimed at restoring equal access, such as opportunities to repeat a class or retake an exam or attaching an addendum to a transcript to explain a low grade.

Discussion: We acknowledge commenters' concerns related to the inclusion of mutual no-contact orders on the non-exhaustive list of possible supportive measures in § 106.30, but the Department declines to exclude this example from the list of supportive measures. The list of possible supportive measures included in the § 106.30 definition is illustrative, not exhaustive. The inclusion of ''mutual restrictions on contact between the parties'' on the illustrative list of possible supportive measures in § 106.30 does not mean that one-way no-contact orders are never appropriate. A fact-specific inquiry is required into whether a carefully crafted no-contact order restricting the actions of only one party would meet the § 106.30 definition of supportive measures. For example, if a recipient issues a one-way no-contact order to help enforce a restraining order, preliminary injunction, or other order of protection issued by a court, or if a one-way no-contact order does not unreasonably burden the other party, then a one-way no-contact order may be appropriate. The Department also reiterates that sexual harassment allegations presenting a risk to the physical health or safety of a person may justify emergency removal of a respondent in accordance with the § 106.44(c) emergency removal provision, which could include a no-trespass or other no-contact order issued against a respondent.

The inclusion of mutual no-contact orders on an illustrative list does not mean the final regulations require complainants to face their respondents on campus, in classrooms, or in dorms. Rather, the express inclusion of mutual no-contact orders suggests that recipients can offer measures—tempered by the requirements that they are not punitive, disciplinary, or unreasonably burdensome to the other party—to limit the interactions, communications, or contact, between the parties. The final regulations do not require recipients to initiate administrative proceedings (i.e., a grievance process) in order to determine and implement appropriate supportive measures. Contrary to the arguments of commenters, the Department believes that mutual no-contact may constitute reasonable restrictions imposed on both parties, because under certain circumstances such a measure serves the purposes of protecting each party's right to pursue educational opportunities, protecting the safety of all parties, and deterring sexual harassment. The Department believes that ''mutual restrictions on contact between the parties'' may in many circumstances provide benefits to the complainant, for example, where such a mutual no-contact order serves the interest of protecting safety or deterring sexual harassment by forbidding communication between the parties, which might not require either party to change dorm rooms or even re-arrange class schedules. Further restrictions, such as avoiding physical proximity between the parties, will require a fact-specific analysis to determine the scope of a no-contact order that may be appropriate under § 106.30; for example, where both parties are athletes and sometimes practice on the same field, consideration must be given to the scope of a no-contact order that deters sexual harassment, without unreasonably burdening the other party, with the goal of restricting contact between the parties without requiring either party to forgo educational activities. It may be unreasonably burdensome to prevent respondents from attending extra-curricular activities that a recipient offers as a result of a one-way no contact order prior to being determined responsible; similarly, it may be unreasonably burdensome to restrict a complainant from accessing campus locations in order to prevent contact with the respondent. In some circumstances, for example, a complainant might be offered a supportive measure consisting of a mutual no-contact order restricting either party from communicating with the other (which measure likely would not unreasonably burden either party). If, however, the complainant wishes to avoid all physical sightings of a respondent and not only an order prohibiting communications, if appropriate the complainant may receive a supportive measure in the form of an alternate housing assignment (without fee or cost to the complainant). The Department does not view such a supportive measure in such a circumstance as unreasonably burdening the complainant, because alternate supportive measures also would have prevented sexual harassment (by prohibiting all communication between the parties). Under § 106.44(a), a Title IX Coordinator must consider a complainant's wishes with respect to supportive measures, and if a complainant would like a different housing arrangement as part of a supportive measure, then a Title IX Coordinator should consider offering such a supportive measure.

The Department does not believe that ''mutual restrictions on contact between the parties'' could constitute unlawful retaliation by restricting the complainant's own participation in certain programs or activities of the recipient as well as that of the respondent. Such a supportive measure would simply treat both parties equally, and ''restrictions on contact'' could be limited in scope to prohibiting communications between the parties, which may not affect the complainant's ability to participate in classes or activities. The Department notes that the § 106.30 definition's requirements that supportive measures be non-disciplinary and non-punitive apply equally to protect complainants against a recipient taking action that punishes or sanctions a complainant. In response to commenters' concerns about complainants being unfairly punished in the wake of reporting sexual harassment, the Department added § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation. Actions taken by a recipient under the guise of ''supportive measures'' that actually have the purpose and effect of penalizing the complainant for the purpose of discouraging the complainant from exercising rights under Title IX would constitute unlawful retaliation.

We also acknowledge the various other suggested modifications to the list of supportive measures offered by commenters, but we decline to expand this list. The Department encourages recipients to broadly consider what measures they can reasonably offer to individual students to ensure continued equal access to a recipient's education program and activities for a complainant, irrespective of whether a complainant files a formal complaint, and for a respondent, when a formal complaint is filed. The Department has provided a list to illustrate the range of possible supportive measures, but the list of supportive measures is not intended to be exhaustive. Nothing in § 106.30 precludes recipients from considering and providing supportive measures not listed in the definition, including measures designed to retrospectively ''restore'' or prospectively ''preserve'' a complainant's equal educational access. We note that the § 106.30 already includes the example of ''course-related adjustments'' which could encompass several suggested measures identified by commenters, such as opportunities to retake classes or exams, or adjusting an academic transcript.

Other Language/Terminology Comments

Comments: One commenter expressed concern that the terms ''survivor'' and ''victim'' used in the NPRM to describe a person who merely alleges something has happened to them are prejudicial and anti-male. Other commenters asserted that the Department's proposed regulations are biased in favor of males partly due to the use of neutral terms such as ''complainant'' and ''respondent'' instead of ''survivor'' or ''perpetrator.'' One commenter suggested that, instead of using the term ''complainant,'' the final regulations should refer to ''student survivors'' or ''those who face harassment.'' The commenter further recommended that the final regulations use the term ''perpetrator'' instead of ''respondent,'' saying that the use of the term ''respondent'' is confusing, and fails to account for perpetrators who are never formally investigated, and therefore are never in a formal respondent role (i.e., because they have not responded to anything).

Discussion: The Department disagrees that the use of the term survivor or victim in the NPRM is biased, anti-male, or pro-male. The term ''survivor'' was used five times in the preamble to refer generally to individuals who have been victims of sexual harassment. The Department listened to advocates for these individuals, as we listened to other stakeholders. The use of the term survivor or victim in that context takes no position on the veracity of any particular complainant or respondent, or complainants or respondents in general. The final regulations are intended to be objective and do not use the term ''survivor'' or ''victim'' in the regulatory text, instead using the more neutral terms ''complainant'' and ''respondent.'' The final regulations are intended to be fair, unbiased, and impartial toward both complainants and respondents. When a determination of responsibility is reached against a respondent, the Department's interest is in requiring remedies for the complainant, to further the goal of Title IX by providing remedies to victims of sexual harassment aiming to restore their equal educational access. Although the final regulations do not need to use the word ''victim,'' once a reliable outcome has determined that a complainant was victimized by sexual harassment, the final regulations mandate that remedies be provided to that complainant precisely because after such a determination has been made, that complainant has been fairly, reliably shown to have been the victim of sexual harassment.

Comments: One commenter expressed concern that the terms used in the NPRM reveal a clear preference in protecting the interests of a school and effectively limiting a school's liability rather than protecting the equal right for all students to have access to higher education free from discrimination.

Discussion: The Department does not have, nor does the terminology in the final regulations reflect, any preference for protecting the interests of a school or effectively limiting a school's liability rather than protecting the equal right of all students to have access to higher education free from discrimination. Although the Department is not required to adopt the deliberate indifference standard articulated by the Supreme Court, we are persuaded by the policy rationales relied on by it and believes it is the best policy approach. As the Court reasoned in Davis, a recipient acts with deliberate indifference only when it responds to sexual harassment in a manner that is ''clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances.'' [810] The Department believes this standard holds recipients accountable without depriving them of legitimate and necessary flexibility to make disciplinary decisions and to provide supportive measures that might be necessary in response to sexual harassment. Moreover, the Department believes that teachers and local school leaders with unique knowledge of the school climate and student body are best positioned to make disciplinary decisions; thus, unless the recipient's response to sexual harassment is clearly unreasonable in light of known circumstances, the Department will not second guess such decisions. In addition, the final regulations impose obligations on recipients that go beyond the deliberate indifference standard as set forth in Davis; for example, by requiring that recipients' non-deliberately indifferent response must include offering supportive measures to a complainant under § 106.44(a). Additionally, as explained in more detail in the ''Section 106.44(b) Proposed 'Safe Harbors,' generally'' subsection in the ''Recipient's Response in Specific Circumstances'' section, these final regulations do not include any of the proposed safe harbors in the NPRM for recipients.

Changes: None.

Comments: One commenter opposed the use of criminal terms since many of the terms that relate to the findings have legal definitions in criminal law, for which due process protections already exist, and the use of such language suggests that colleges do not want the overall Title IX process to be an educational experience and not a criminal justice proceeding.

Discussion: The Department disagrees with the commenter's contention. The Department has in no way implied that these proceedings are criminal in nature and the final regulations use terms such as ''complainant'' and ''respondent,'' ''decision-maker'' and ''determination regarding responsibility'' to describe features of the grievance process, language intentionally adopted to avoid reference to terms used in civil courts or criminal proceedings (e.g., plaintiff, defendant, prosecutor, judge, verdict). In this way, the final regulations acknowledge that the resolution of allegations of Title IX sexual harassment in an education program or activity serves a different purpose and occurs in a different context from a civil or criminal court. As explained in the ''Role of Due Process in the Grievance Process'' section of this preamble, the § 106.45 grievance process is rooted in principles of due process to create a process fair to all parties and likely to result in reliable outcomes, and while the Department believes that the grievance process is consistent with constitutional due process, the § 106.45 grievance process is independent from constitutional due process because it is designed to effectuate the purposes of Title IX as a civil rights statute. The Department understands the concerns expressed by some commenters that colleges want the overall Title IX process to be an educational experience and that the outcome is administrative and believes the final regulations prescribe a consistent grievance process appropriate for administratively resolving allegations of sexual harassment in an education program or activity.

Changes: None.

Comments: One commenter suggested using the word ''discrimination'' instead of ''harassment'' in places where the NPRM describes actionable behavior because harassment does not have to occur for there to be discrimination.

Discussion: The Department declines to adopt the word ''discrimination'' instead of ''harassment'' in these final regulations. The Department's Title IX regulations already address sex discrimination, and these final regulations intend to address sexual harassment as a particular form of sex discrimination under Title IX. Complaints of sex discrimination that do not constitute sexual harassment may be made to a recipient for handling under the prompt and equitable grievance procedures that recipients must adopt under § 106.8(c). When the sex discrimination complained of constitutes sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, these final regulations govern how recipients must respond to that form of sex discrimination.

Changes: None.

Comments: One commenter expressed concern that the NPRM used the term ''guilt,'' which equates school conduct processes to the court system and seems contrary to the NPRM's goals of distinguishing between school conduct processes and the judicial system. The commenter argued that instead, the final regulations should use the terms ''found responsible'' and ''not responsible,'' and should only draw comparisons with civil, rather than criminal, case law.

Discussion: The Department disagrees with the concern that the NPRM inappropriately used the term ''guilt.'' The word ''guilt'' appears only in two instances in the NPRM, and neither of those occurrences is in the text of the proposed regulations. In the first instance, the NPRM notes that ''Secretary DeVos stated that in endeavoring to find a 'better way forward' that works for all students, 'non-negotiable principles' include the right of every survivor to be taken seriously and the right of every person accused to know that guilt is not predetermined.'' [811] Second, the NPRM states that ''[a] fundamental notion of a fair proceeding is that a legal system does not prejudge a person's guilt or liability.'' [812] In both contexts, the NPRM was using the term guilt generally to refer to culpability for an offense. The Department also declines to revise the final regulations to use the terms ''found responsible'' and ''not responsible'' because it has already utilized similar language; for example, § 106.45(b)(1)(vi) uses ''determination of responsibility'' in the context of finding a respondent responsible and § 106.45(b)(7) employs the term ''determination regarding responsibility'' in the context of a determination that could either find the respondent responsible or non-responsible. The NPRM uses the same or similar terms.[813]

Comments: Several commenters suggested that the term ''equitable'' should be used instead of ''equal'' because the two terms have different meanings, and Title IX focuses on educational equity. Without citing a specific provision, one commenter argued that ''equal'' would assume that if a translator were provided for one party, a translator must be provided for the other party.

Discussion: The Department understands commenters' concerns that ''equal'' and ''equitable'' have different implications, and the final regulations use both terms with such a distinction in mind. Where parties are given ''equal'' opportunity, for example, both parties must be treated the same. By contrast, where parties must be treated ''equitably,'' the final regulations explain what equitable means for a complainant and for a respondent. The Department disagrees that the use of ''equal'' in these final regulations is inappropriate. The equal opportunity for both parties to receive a disability accommodation does not mean that both parties must receive a disability accommodation or that they must receive the same disability accommodation. Similarly, both parties may not need a translator, and a recipient need not provide a translator for a party who does not need one, even if it provides a translator for the party who needs one.

Comments: One commenter suggested using the term ''education program or activity'' instead of ''schools'' to be more consistent with statute and case law. The commenter asserted that use of the word ''schools'' may limit the ability to investigate issues that arise during sporting activities, afterschool programs, on field trips, etc.

Discussion: Although the Department declines to remove reference to ''schools,'' the Department provides a definition for ''elementary and secondary schools'' as well as ''postsecondary institutions'' in § 106.30. The Department believes that it is important to distinguish between these types of recipients as the type of hearing that a recipient must provide under § 106.45(b)(6) may be different if the recipient is an elementary or secondary school as opposed to a postsecondary institution.

To address the commenter's concerns, the Department notes that § 106.2(h) provides a definition of ''program or activity'' as all of the operations of elementary and secondary schools and postsecondary institutions. Additionally, the Department has revised § 106.44(a) to specify that for purposes of §§ 106.30, 106.44, and 106.45, an education program or activity includes locations, events, or circumstances over which the recipient exercised substantial control over both the respondent and the context in which the harassment occurs. This definition aligns with the Supreme Court's opinion in Davis [814] and clarifies when sporting activities, afterschool programs, or field trips constitute part of the recipient's education program or activity. The Department also revised § 106.44(a) to state that for purposes of §§ 106.30, 106.44, and 106.45, an ''education program or activity'' also includes any building owned or controlled by a student organization that is officially recognized by a postsecondary institution. The revisions to § 106.44(a) to help better define ''education program or activity'' are explained more fully in the ''Section 106.44(a) 'education program or activity' '' subsection of the ''Section 106.44 Recipient's Response to Sexual Harassment, Generally'' section.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.44(a) to specify that an education program or activity includes locations, events, or circumstances over which the recipient exercised substantial control over both the respondent and the context in which the harassment occurs, and also includes any building owned or controlled by a student organization that is officially recognized by a postsecondary institution.

Comments: One commenter expressed concern that the NPRM's use of the term ''students'' is too narrow in light of the language of Title IX and current Title IX regulations, as well as the Supreme Court's repeated determinations that Title IX encompasses all individuals participating in education programs and activities. Another commenter suggested that the term ''student'' in the NPRM should be replaced with ''person'' consistent with statute and case law and because the term ''student'' may be restrictive because it does not encompass employees, volunteers, parents, and community members. One commenter expressed concern that the definition of ''student'' as a person who has gained admission is problematic because institutions of higher education, particularly those who do not have open enrollment, typically consider an applicant a student once they have submitted a deposit, indicating their acceptance of an admission offer and commitment to attend.

Discussion: The Department disagrees with the commenters who opposed the use of the term ''students.'' Title IX provides that a recipient of Federal funding may not discriminate on the basis of sex in the education program or activity that it operates and extends protections to any ''person.'' The final regulations similarly use ''person'' or ''individual'' to ensure that the Title IX non-discrimination mandate applies to anyone in a recipient's education program or activity. For example, § 106.30 defines sexual harassment as conduct that deprives ''a person'' of equal access; § 106.30 defines a ''complainant'' as an ''individual'' who is alleged to be the victim of sexual harassment. Where the final regulations use the phrase ''students and employees'' or ''students,'' such terms are used not to narrow the application of Title IX's non-discrimination mandate but to require particular actions by the recipient reasonably intended to benefit students, employees, or both; for example, § 106.8(a) requires recipients to notify ''students and employees'' of contact information for the Title IX Coordinator. Where the final regulations intend to include ''applicants for admission'' in addition to ''students'' the phrase ''applicants for admission'' is used; for example, § 106.8(b)(2)(ii) precludes recipients from using publications that state that the recipient treats applicants for admission (or employment), students, or employees differently on the basis of sex (unless permitted under Title IX). Both Title IX and existing Title IX regulations use the term ''student'' ubiquitously.[815] The existing Title IX regulations, in 34 CFR 106.2(r), define ''student'' as ''a person who has gained admission.'' ''Admission'', as defined in 34 CFR 106.2(q), ''means selection for part-time, full-time, special, associate, transfer, exchange, or any other enrollment, membership, or matriculation in or at an education program or activity operated by a recipient.'' The Department disagrees with the commenter's concern that the definition of ''student'' as a person who has gained admission is problematic. The Department does not believe the term ''student'' should be changed to reflect other persons who are not enrolled in the recipient's education program or activity. The term ''student'' as defined in 34 CFR 106.2(r) aligns with the definition of ''formal complaint'' in § 106.30 that provides at the time of filing a formal complaint, a complainant must be participating in or attempting to participate in the education program or activity of the recipient with which the formal complaint is filed.[816] A student who has applied for admission and has been admitted is attempting to participate in the education program or activity of the recipient.

Changes: None.

Comments: One commenter expressed concern that equating ''trauma-informed'' and ''impartial'' is a false equivalency that threatens to undermine the quality and efficacy of the Title IX process. The commenter argued that ''trauma-informed'' refers to a body of research, practice, and theory that teaches professionals who interact with victims to recognize that all individuals process trauma differently, to understand different responses to trauma, and to recognize ways in which we can avoid further traumatization of involved parties through sensitive questioning, mindfulness-based practices, and avoiding potentially triggering situations such as unnecessarily repetitive questioning. Further, equating these two terms is dismissive of decades of research and best practices concerning gender and sexual-based violence and harassment prevention and response.

Discussion: The Department disagrees that the final regulations equate ''trauma-informed'' and ''impartial'' in a manner that undermines the quality and efficacy of the Title IX process. It appears that the commenter prefers the Department to adopt a trauma-informed approach as a best practice. The Department understands from personal anecdotes and research studies that sexual violence is a traumatic experience for survivors. The Department is aware that the neurobiology of trauma and the impact of trauma on a survivor's neurobiological functioning is a developing field of study with application to the way in which investigators of sexual violence offenses interact with victims in criminal justice systems and campus sexual misconduct proceedings.[817] The final regulations require impartiality on the part of Title IX personnel (i.e., Title IX Coordinators, investigators, decision-makers, and persons who facilitate informal resolutions) [818] to reinforce the truth-seeking purpose of a grievance process. The Department wishes to emphasize that treating all parties with dignity, respect, and sensitivity without bias, prejudice, or stereotypes infecting interactions with parties fosters impartiality and truth-seeking. While the final regulations do not use the term ''trauma-informed,'' nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient from applying trauma-informed techniques, practices, or approaches so long as such practices are consistent with the requirements of § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) and other requirements in § 106.45.

specific time frames, such as ten ''days.'' The commenter suggested that the Department clarify whether these are ''calendar'' days or ''working'' days.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the commenter's request for clarification as to how to calculate ''days'' with respect to various time frames referenced in the proposed regulations and appreciates the opportunity to clarify that because the Department does not require a specific method for calculating ''days,'' recipients retain the flexibility to adopt the method that works best for the recipient's operations; for example, a recipient could use calendar days, school days, or business days, or a method the recipient already uses in other aspects of its operations.

Changes: None.

Comments: One commenter asserted that it is unclear whether § 106.6(d) intended to cover recipients that are not government actors. The commenter suggested adding ''whether or not that recipient is a government actor'' after ''recipient.''

Discussion: As explained in the ''Role of Due Process in the Grievance Process'' section of this preamble, the Department recognizes that some recipients are State actors with responsibilities to provide due process of law and other rights to students and employees under the U.S. Constitution, while other recipients are private institutions that do not have constitutional obligations to their students and employees. The final regulations apply to all recipients covered by Title IX because fair, reliable procedures that best promote the purposes of Title IX are as important in public schools, colleges, and universities as in private ones. The grievance process prescribed in the final regulations is important for effective enforcement of Title IX and is thus consistent with, but independent of, constitutional due process. Where enforcement of Title IX's non-discrimination mandate is likely to present potential intersections with a public recipient's obligation to respect the constitutional rights of students and employees, the final regulations caution recipients that nothing in these final regulations requires a recipient to restrict constitutional rights.[819] Similarly, the Department, as an agency of the Federal government, cannot require private recipients to restrict constitutional rights. The Department will not require private recipients to abide by restrictions in the U.S. Constitution that do not apply to them. The Department, as a Federal agency, however, must interpret and enforce Title IX in a manner that does not require or cause any recipient, whether public or private, to restrict or otherwise abridge any person's constitutional rights.

Changes: None.

Comments: One commenter encouraged the Department to explicitly state that Title IX and the Title IX regulations do not apply to schools that do not receive Federal financial assistance to help protect their autonomy and Constitutional rights, which would promote diversity in education by protecting the autonomy and freedom of private and religious schools to thrive according to their stated mission and purpose. The commenter stated that their schools are committed to providing safe and equal learning opportunities for each student that they serve and noted that such language has been included in reauthorizations of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act (ESEA) and that the Every Student Succeeds Act, the most recent reauthorization passed in 2015, contains Section 8506 which specifically states, ''Nothing in this Act shall be construed to affect any private school that does not receive funds or services under this Act'' [20 U.S.C. 7886(a)].''

Discussion: The Department does not believe it is necessary to further explain in the final regulations that Title IX applies only to recipients of Federal financial assistance; the text of Title IX, 20 U.S.C. 1681, clearly states that the Title IX non-discrimination mandate applies to education programs or activities that receive Federal financial assistance, and expressly exempts educational institutions controlled by religious organizations from compliance with Title IX to the extent that compliance with Title IX is inconsistent with the religious tenets of the religious organization even if the educational institution does receive Federal financial assistance.[820] Existing Title IX regulations already sufficiently mirror that Title IX statutory language by defining ''recipient'' [821] and affirming the Title IX exemption for educational institutions controlled by religious organizations.[822]

Changes: None.

Comments: One commenter stated that the proposed regulations were not easy to understand because the ''Summary'' section of the NPRM contained too little information. The commenter asserted that although the proposed regulations were intended to protect young people, young people would not be able to understand them. Another commenter opposed the NPRM because, the commenter asserted, the details were perplexing, vague, and did not tell in sufficient detail, how the proposed rules would be implemented in terms of the behavior, conditions, and situations involved. Another commenter expressed concern that the ''sloppy and biased language'' in the NPRM needed to be corrected, pointing specifically to the summary comments at 83 FR 61462 and elsewhere in the NPRM.

Discussion: The Department acknowledges the concern from the commenter that the proposed regulations are not easy enough to understand. However, the purpose of the NPRM is to provide a basic overview of the Department's proposed actions and reasons for the proposals. The Department believes that the NPRM accomplished this purpose by providing not only a summary section but also a background section and specific discussions of each proposed provision.

The Department acknowledges the concern of the commenter that opposed the NPRM because the commenter believed the language was too vague and does not provide sufficient detail as to how the proposed rules would be implemented in specific situations. The Department believes that both the NPRM, and now these final regulations, strike an appropriate balance between containing sufficient details as to a recipient's legal obligations without improperly purporting to specify outcomes for all scenarios and situations many of which will turn on particular facts and circumstances. The Department wishes to emphasize that when determining how to comply with these final regulations, recipients have flexibility to employ age-appropriate methods, exercise common sense and good judgment, and take into account the needs of the parties involved.

The Department disagrees that any of the language in the proposed rules or final regulations is biased, and notes that the Department's choice of language throughout the text of the final regulations is neutral, impartial, and unbiased with respect to complainants and respondents.

Changes: None.

Comments: One commenter expressed concern that the final regulations should not emphasize the view that schools are [819] E.g., § 106.6(d); § 106.44(a) (stating that the Department may not deem a recipient to have satisfied the recipient's duty to not be deliberately indifferent based on the recipient's restriction of rights protected under the U.S. Constitution, including the First Amendment, Fifth Amendment, and Fourteenth Amendment).

in a unique position to make disciplinary decisions based on school climate because all decisions, including disciplinary decisions, should be made congruent with the intent and spirit of the proposed rules. Stating that schools are in a unique position regarding decision making invites many forms of prejudice and renders decisions less reliable.

Discussion: The Department disagrees with the position that the final regulations should not emphasize the view that schools are in a unique position to make disciplinary decisions based on school climate. The Department disagrees with the commenter's conclusory assertion that by acknowledging schools are in a unique position to make such decisions that the Department invites prejudice that renders decisions less reliable. As the Supreme Court reasoned in Davis, Title IX must be interpreted in a manner that leaves flexibility in schools' disciplinary decisions and that does not place courts in the position of second guessing the disciplinary decisions made by school administrators.[823] As a matter of policy, the Department believes that these same principles should govern administrative enforcement of Title IX.

Changes: None.

Comments: One commenter suggested including a full list of stakeholders who were interviewed and involved in the process of developing the NPRM to establish credibility (with aliases provided to protect the privacy of individual participants), as well as the meeting minutes included as an appendix.

Discussion: The Department does not believe it is necessary to publish a full list of stakeholders who were interviewed and involved in the process of developing the NPRM to establish credibility or publish meeting minutes included as an appendix. The Department noted in the NPRM that it conducted listening sessions and discussions with stakeholders expressing a variety of positions for and against the status quo, including advocates for survivors of sexual violence; advocates for accused students; organizations representing schools and colleges; scholars and experts in law, psychology, and neuroscience; and numerous individuals who have experienced school-level Title IX proceedings as a complainant or respondent; school and college administrators; child and sex abuse prosecutors.[824] The Department believes this level of detail is sufficient to support the Department's contention that the Department conducted wide outreach in developing the NPRM.

Changes: None.

Comments: One commenter suggested including an index of terms that define legal terminology, including ''respondeat superior, ''reasonableness standard,'' ''deliberate indifference standard,'' ''constructive notice,'' and so forth because the use of legal terminology throughout these regulations without accompanying layperson's commentary or clear definition of the terminology applied throughout the proposed revisions confuse and divert attention from the actual meaning of the proposed rules.

Discussion: The Department does not believe it is necessary to include an index of terms that define legal terminology. The Department has defined key terms as necessary in § 106.30, and § 106.2 also provides relevant definitions. The remainder of the language used in the final regulations should be interpreted both in the context of the final regulations and in accordance with its ordinary public meaning.

The Department agrees that the term ''respondeat superior'' is a legal term of art that may be confusing in light of the final regulations' frequent use of the word ''respondent'' which looks very similar to the word ''respondeat'' as used in the phrase ''respondeat superior'' in the § 106.30 definition of ''actual knowledge.'' To address this concern, the Department has revised the definition of ''actual knowledge'' in § 106.30 to use the term ''vicarious liability'' instead of ''respondeat superior.'' Although ''vicarious liability'' is a legal term, ''vicarious liability'' more readily conveys the concept of being liable for the actions or omissions of another, without causing unnecessary confusion with the word ''respondent.''

Changes: Partly in response to commenters' concerns that the phrase ''respondeat superior'' was not recognizable as a legal term or was too easily confused with use of the word ''respondent'' throughout the final regulations, we have revised the definition of ''actual knowledge'' in § 106.30 by replacing term ''respondeat superior'' with ''vicarious liability.''

Comments: One commenter suggested including support and context for the Department's contention in the NPRM that the proposed rules will give sexual harassment complainants greater confidence to report and expect their school to respond in a meaningful way by separating a recipient's obligation to respond to a report of sexual harassment from the recipient's obligation to investigate formal complaints of sexual harassment; the commenter argued that the NPRM thus implies that either complainants do not currently have a clear understanding of their Title IX rights and a school's obligation to respond or that complainants are under the misconception that all complaints are considered formal complaints under the current Title IX guidance and regulations.

Discussion: The Department's past guidance required recipients to always investigate any report of sexual harassment, even when the complainant only wanted supportive measures and did not want an investigation, which necessarily results in some intrusion into the complainant's privacy.[825] This guidance combined a recipient's obligation to respond to a report of sexual harassment with the recipient's obligation to investigate formal complaints of sexual harassment. This guidance also did not distinguish between an investigation which resulted in the imposition of disciplinary sanctions and an inquiry into a report of sexual harassment.[826] The Department's past guidance did not specifically provide both parties the opportunity to know about an investigation and participate in such an investigation, when the investigation may lead to the imposition of disciplinary sanctions against the respondent and the provision of remedies. Through §§ 106.44 and 106.45, these final regulations clarify when a recipient has the affirmative obligation to conduct an investigation that may lead to the imposition of disciplinary sanctions, requires the recipient to notify both parties of such an investigation, and requires the recipient to provide both parties the opportunity to participate in the process. Irrespective of whether a recipient conducts an investigation under § 106.45, a recipient may inquire about a report of sexual harassment and must offer supportive measures in response to such a report under § 106.44(a). If a recipient does not provide a complainant with supportive measures, then the recipient must document the reasons why such a response as not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances under § 106.45(b)(10)(ii).

Under the Department's past guidance, some students did not know that reporting sexual harassment always would lead to an investigation, even when the student did not want the recipient to investigate. A rigid requirement such as an investigation in every circumstance may chill reporting of sexual harassment, which is in part why these final regulations separate the recipient's obligation to respond to a report of sexual harassment from the obligation to investigate a formal complaint of sexual harassment. Under these final regulations, a student may receive supportive measures irrespective of whether the student files a formal complaint, which results in an investigation. In this manner, these final regulations encourage students to report sexual harassment while allowing them to exercise some control over their report. If students would like supportive measures but do not wish to initiate an investigation under § 106.45, they may make a report of sexual harassment. If students would like supportive measures and also would like the recipient to initiate an investigation under § 106.45, they may file a formal complaint.

The Department disagrees with the premise that separating a recipient's obligation to respond to each known report of sexual harassment from the recipient's obligation to investigate formal complaints of sexual harassment implies that all complainants suffer misconceptions; rather, the Department believes that distinguishing between a recipient's obligation to respond to a report, on the one hand, and a recipient's obligation to investigate a formal complaint on the other hands, provides clarity that benefits complainants, respondents, and recipients.

Changes: None.

Comments: One commenter suggested adding prevention and community educational programming as a possible option schools can utilize as one of the remedies provided following a formal complaint, as well as adding a requirement of educational outreach and prevention programming elsewhere within the final regulations.

Discussion: The Department declines to list prevention and community educational programming as a possible option schools can utilize as a remedy after the conclusion of a grievance process, or to add a requirement of educational outreach and prevention programming elsewhere within the final regulations. The Department notes that nothing in the final regulations prevents recipients from undertaking such efforts. With respect to remedies, the final regulations require a recipient to provide remedies to a complainant where a respondent has been found responsible, and notes that such remedies may include the type of individualized services non-exhaustively listed in the § 106.30 definition of ''supportive measures.'' Whether or not the commenter's understanding of prevention and community education programming would be part of an appropriate remedy for a complainant, designed to restore or preserve the complainant's equal access to education, is a fact-specific matter to be considered by the recipient. With respect to a general requirement that recipients provide prevention and community education programming, the final regulations are focused on governing a recipient's response to sexual harassment incidents, leaving additional education and prevention efforts within a recipient's discretion.

Section 106.44 Recipient's Response to Sexual Harassment, Generally

Section 106.44(a) ''Actual Knowledge''

The Recipient's Self-Interest

Comments: Many commenters expressed concerns about the actual knowledge requirement in § 106.44(a), citing examples of instances in which schools sought to avoid addressing sexual harassment and assault, including high-profile sexual abuse scandals at universities where some university employees failed to report abuse that was reported to them. One commenter asserted that schools discourage sexual harassment and assault reports because the number of reported instances of sexual violence at an institution is publicly available (which harms or is perceived to harm the recipient's reputation), and alleged perpetrators are often prominent members of college communities, including star athletes, fraternity members, leading actors, and promising filmmakers. Commenters argued that, by using an actual knowledge requirement that fails to make employees mandatory reporters, schools will continue to ignore cases of sexual violence and will investigate fewer harassment complaints, resulting in less justice and fewer services for victims of sexual harassment.

Discussion: The Department incorporates here its discussion under the ''Actual Knowledge'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble. As discussed in that section, and in the ''Adoption and Adaption of the Supreme Court's Framework to Address Sexual Harassment'' section of this preamble, we believe that the final regulations appropriately hold recipients liable for responding to every allegation of sexual harassment of which the recipient is aware, ensure that elementary and secondary school students may report to any school employee, and respect the autonomy of complainants at postsecondary institutions to choose whether, and when, the complainant desires to report sexual harassment. No recipient may yield to institutional self-interest by ignoring known allegations of sexual harassment without violating the recipient's obligation to promptly respond as set forth in § 106.44(a).

Changes: None.

Burdening the Complainant

Comments: Numerous commenters argued that § 106.44(a) will have the effect of shifting the burden of each report onto the complainant, who, in addition to dealing with the harm to their mental health from harassment or assault, must also bear the responsibility of locating and reporting to the correct administrator. Several commenters also voiced concern that § 106.44(a) makes it more difficult for victims to know how or to whom to report harassment. Other commenters argued that complainants would be at a loss in instances where the school has not educated students and staff as to who the Title IX Coordinator is, where that person can be found, and what that person's responsibilities are. Several commenters asked what a complainant should do if a complainant has had a negative experience previously with the Title IX Coordinator, because the complainant would have no one else to whom to turn in order to report or file a formal complaint.

Many commenters asserted that § 106.44(a) would chill reports of sexual harassment and assault. Several commenters stated that 59.3 percent of survivors in one study confided in informal support sources while across several studies, fewer than one-third of victims reported to formal sources.[827] One commenter asserted that research has consistently reflected that survivors of campus sexual assault are more likely to disclose to someone with whom they have an existing relationship rather than a campus administrator. Commenters argued that fewer reports would reach the Title IX Coordinator, since the Title IX Coordinator lacks a preexisting personal relationship with survivors. Several commenters asserted that most school personnel do not know who the Title IX Coordinator is, and that these employees will therefore be unable to help complainants find the Title IX Coordinator.

Discussion: The Department incorporates here its discussion under the ''Actual Knowledge'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble. As discussed in that section, and in the ''Adoption and Adaption of the Supreme Court's Framework to Address Sexual Harassment'' section of this preamble, we believe that the definition of actual knowledge in these final regulations has been revised to appropriately trigger a recipient's response obligations by notice to any elementary and secondary school employee, to any recipient's Title IX Coordinator, and to any official with authority to institute corrective measures on the recipient's behalf. The Department believes that respecting a complainant's autonomy is an important, desirable goal and that allowing complainants to discuss or disclose a sexual harassment experience with employees of postsecondary institutions without such confidential conversations automatically triggering the involvement of the recipient's Title IX office will give complainants in postsecondary institutions greater control and autonomy over the reporting process. The final regulations place the burden on recipients to ensure that all students and employees (as well as parents of elementary and secondary school students, and others) are notified of contact information for the Title IX Coordinator, so that when a complainant chooses to report, the complainant may easily locate the Title IX Coordinator's office location, telephone number, and email address, and report using any of those methods, or any other means resulting in the Title IX Coordinator receiving the person's verbal or written report. Nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient, including a postsecondary institution, from instructing any or all of its employees to report sexual harassment disclosures and reports to the Title IX Coordinator, if the recipient believes that such a universal mandatory reporting system best serves the recipient's student and employee population. However, universal mandatory reporting systems have led to the unintended consequence of reducing options for complainants at postsecondary institutions to discuss sexual harassment experiences confidentially with trusted employees,[828] and the final regulations therefore do not impose a universal mandatory reporting system in the postsecondary institution context.

Changes: None.

Elementary and Secondary Schools

Comments: Many commenters stated that the actual knowledge requirement is inappropriate for elementary and secondary school students because, from a young child's perspective, there is no distinction between a teacher, teacher's aide, bus driver, cafeteria worker, school resource officer, or maintenance staff person; to a young child, they are all grown-ups. Commenters asserted that this is particularly true for adults such as bus drivers and school resource officers, who can take corrective measures (kicking a student off the bus, for example) but not necessarily ''on behalf of'' the school. Several commenters stated that often a peer seeking help for a friend brings an issue of sexual harassment or assault to the attention of teachers or other school personnel, and commenters asserted that these allegations should be formally addressed by the school. Numerous commenters asserted that all school employees, not just teachers, should be responsible employees. By ensuring that a student can confide in counselors, aides, and coaches, commenters believed that students would be more likely to speak up and receive benefits to which they are entitled under Title IX. Commenters asserted that the proposed rules would conflict with other mandatory reporting requirements; for example, State laws requiring all school staff to notify law enforcement or child welfare agencies of child abuse. Another commenter stated that, by limiting the definition of complainant to only ''the victim,'' the proposed regulations would not allow for parents to file complaints on behalf of their children, and would not contemplate a witness to sexual harassment making a complaint. One commenter asserted that the actual knowledge requirement may be in tension with the Every Student Succeeds Act (ESSA); the commenter asserted that under ESSA, a school district with probable cause to believe a teacher engaged in sexual misconduct is prohibited from helping that teacher from getting a new job yet, the commenter argued, under the proposed rules the school district would not need to take any action to address the teacher's sexual misconduct absent a formal complaint.

Discussion: The Department incorporates here its discussion under the ''Actual Knowledge'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble. As discussed in that section, and in the ''Adoption and Adaption of the Supreme Court's Framework to Address Sexual Harassment'' section of this preamble, we believe that the final regulations appropriately hold recipients liable for responding to every allegation of sexual harassment of which the recipient is aware, ensure that elementary and secondary school students may report to any school employee, and ensure that every recipient's educational community understands that any person may report sexual harassment (whether they are the victim, or a witness, or any other third party), triggering the recipient's obligation to promptly respond. As discussed in the ''Complainant'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble, we have revised the definition of ''complainant'' to remove the inference that the alleged victim themselves must be the same person who reports the sexual harassment. Upon notice that any person has allegedly been victimized by conduct that could constitute sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, a recipient must respond, including by promptly offering supporting measures to the alleged victim (i.e., the complainant).

The final regulations do not contravene or alter any Federal, State, or local requirements regarding other mandatory reporting obligations that school employees have. Those obligations are distinct from the obligations in these final regulations.

The Department acknowledges that the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 (ESEA), as amended by the Every Student Succeeds Act (ESSA), may require a recipient subject to ESEA to take certain steps with respect to an employee who has been accused of sexual misconduct when a recipient has probable cause to believe the employee engaged in sexual misconduct.[829] We do not believe that the actual knowledge requirement in these final regulations is in tension with ESSA. The final regulations define actual knowledge to include notice of allegations of sexual harassment; a recipient cannot wait to respond to sexual harassment allegations until the recipient has probable cause that the sexual harassment occurred. Under revised § 106.44(a) the recipient's prompt response to allegations of sexual harassment must include offering the complainant supportive measures irrespective of whether the complainant files, or the Title IX Coordinator signs, a formal complaint. A recipient's obligations under ESSA may factor into a Title IX Coordinator's decision to sign a formal complaint initiating a grievance process against an employee-respondent, even when the complainant (i.e., the alleged victim) does not wish to file a formal complaint, if, for example, the recipient wishes to investigate allegations in order to determine whether the recipient has probable cause of employee sexual misconduct that affect the recipient's ESSA obligations.

Confusion for Employees

Comments: Numerous commenters expressed concern that resident assistants or resident advisors, professors, and coaches may not know how to respond to complainants appropriately if the proposed rules allow postsecondary institution employees to have discretion over whether to report sexual harassment to the Title IX Coordinator. Several commenters asked the Department to specify that all schools should be responsible for educating all employees about a variety of procedures for handling sexual harassment and violence. Another commenter suggested that deans, directors, department heads, or any supervisory employees should be held individually liable for having actual knowledge of a report of sexual misconduct. One commenter asserted that a greater number of employees should be required to inform students of their right to file a formal complaint and to obtain supportive measures. One commenter stated that schools following the proposed rules might be sued for inadequate reporting policies, since a recipient's failure to tell its employees to respond appropriately to disclosures arguably amounts to an intentional decision not to respond to third-party discrimination.

Discussion: The Department incorporates here its discussion under the ''Actual Knowledge'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble. As discussed in that section, and in the ''Adoption and Adaption of the Supreme Court's Framework to Address Sexual Harassment'' section of this preamble, the Department agrees with commenters' concerns that a wider pool of trusted adults in elementary and secondary schools should trigger a recipient's obligations, and, thus, the final regulations expand the definition of actual knowledge to include notice to any employee of an elementary and secondary school. However, for reasons discussed in the aforementioned sections of this preamble, the Department disagrees that the pool of postsecondary institution employees to whom notice charges the recipient with actual knowledge needs to be expanded beyond the Title IX Coordinator and officials with authority to institute corrective measures on the recipient's behalf.

The Department disagrees that these final regulations increase liability for recipients with respect to inadequate reporting policies. These final regulations require recipients to respond to sexual harassment, or allegations of sexual harassment, when the recipient has actual knowledge, defined in part to include notice to an official with authority to institute corrective measures on behalf of the recipient. This requirement, and definition, are also used by Federal courts in applying the Gebser/Davis framework in private Title IX lawsuits.[830] These final regulations go beyond the Gebser/Davis framework by requiring recipients to have in place clear, accessible reporting options, and requiring recipients to notify its educational community of those reporting options. The recipient's educational community must be notified about how to report sexual harassment in person, by mail, telephone, or email, and the final regulations specify that any person may report sexual harassment (whether the person reporting is the alleged victim themselves or any third party).

Intersection Between Actual Knowledge and Deliberate Indifference

Comments: One commenter asked, if a recipient has actual knowledge that a student or employee has been subjected to unwelcome conduct on the basis of sex, but the recipient does not know whether the misconduct effectively denied the victim equal access to the recipient's education program or activity, whether the recipient must respond under §§ 106.44(a) and 106.44(b)(2), to at least seek out the missing information and if not, whether the respondent has an obligation to inform the complainant of the nature of the missing and needed additional information regarding denial of equal access.

Discussion: The Department acknowledges the commenter's question about how much detail is needed in order for the recipient to have actual knowledge triggering the recipient's obligation to provide a non-deliberately indifferent response, and whether a recipient with partial information about a sexual harassment allegation has a responsibility to notify the complainant that additional information is needed to further evaluate or respond to the allegation. In response, the Department notes that the definition of ''complainant'' under § 106.30 is an individual who is alleged to be the victim of conduct that could constitute sexual harassment; thus, the recipient need not have received notice of facts that definitively indicate whether a reasonable person would determine that the complainant's equal access has been effectively denied in order for the recipient to be required to respond promptly in a non-deliberately indifferent manner under § 106.44(a). The definition of ''actual knowledge,'' in § 106.30, also reflects this concept as actual knowledge means notice of sexual harassment or allegations of sexual harassment.

These final regulations, and § 106.44(a) in particular, incorporate principles similar to the principles in the Department's 2001 Guidance with respect to a recipient's response to a student's or parent's report of sexual harassment or sexual harassment allegations, or a recipient's response to direct observation by a responsible employee of conduct that could constitute sexual harassment. The Department's 2001 Guidance states:

> If a student or the parent of an elementary or secondary student provides information or complains about sexual harassment of the student, the school should initially discuss what actions the student or parent is seeking in response to the harassment. The school should explain the avenues for informal and formal action, including a description of the grievance procedure that is available for sexual harassment complaints and an explanation of how the procedure works. If a responsible school employee has directly observed sexual harassment of a student, the school should contact the student who was harassed (or the parent, depending upon the age of the student), explain that the school is responsible for taking steps to correct the harassment, and provide the same information described in the previous sentence.[831]

Like the 2001 Guidance, these final regulations in § 106.6(g) recognize that a parent or guardian may have the legal right to act on behalf of a ''complainant,'' ''respondent,'' ''party,'' or other individual. Section 106.44(a) also requires that the Title IX Coordinator promptly contact the complainant to discuss the availability of supportive measures as defined in § 106.30, consider the complainant's wishes with respect to supportive measures, inform the complainant of the availability of supportive measures with or without the filing of a formal complaint, and explain the process for filing a formal complaint. Thus, if a parent or guardian has a legal right to act on behalf of a student, the parent or guardian has the right to act on behalf of a Title IX complainant, including with respect to discussing supportive measures, or deciding to file a formal complaint.

Modeling Reporting on the Military System

Comments: Commenters argued that the reporting system used in the U.S. military to address sexual assault should be modified for use in Title IX reporting systems in order to best serve civil rights purposes. Commenters described the military reporting system as providing sexual assault victims with a two-track reporting system, under which a victim can choose a ''restricted'' or ''unrestricted'' report. Commenters described the military system's ''restricted'' report option as allowing the victim to report confidentially, for the purpose of receiving services, and no investigation is commenced unless the victim chooses an ''unrestricted'' reporting path whereby the victim's identity is not confidential and charges are initiated against the alleged perpetrator. Commenters asserted that giving victims these options for reporting helps address the well-known and well-researched fact that sexual assault is underreported throughout society, including in military and school environments, and that many survivors of sexual violence exercise the ''victim's veto'' whereby no investigation takes place, and no services are given to a victim, because the victim chooses not to report their experience in any official manner. Commenters asserted that the withdrawn 2014 Q&A essentially created this two-track model,[832] which best serves the needs of complainants, and argued that it best fits the purpose of civil rights protections, especially as compared to the traditional law enforcement model, under which a victim's only option is to report to police, and then police officers and prosecutors have sole discretion whether to investigate and whether to prosecute, and the victim has little or no control over those decisions, leading many victims to exercise the ''victim's veto'' and never report at all.[833]

Commenters described the approach of the withdrawn 2014 Q&A as giving survivors two choices of how to report, so survivors essentially would make the decision whether to initiate an investigation. Commenters asserted that the withdrawn 2014 Q&A ensured that if a survivor made an official report to a responsible employee or to the Title IX Coordinator the school must investigate unless the survivor explicitly requested that there be no investigation and the Title IX Coordinator granted that request after weighing multiple factors. On the other hand, commenters asserted, under that guidance a survivor could choose a ''confidential path'' and access services and accommodations for healing, without initiating an investigation unless or until the survivor changed their mind and officially reported to a responsible employee or to the Title IX Coordinator (which, commenters stated, is the equivalent in the military system as turning a restricted report into an unrestricted report, which is commonplace). Commenters urged the Department to reinstate the withdrawn 2014 Q&A, rather than keep the provisions in the proposed rules, regarding how complainants must report and what happens after a complainant reports.

Discussion: The Department is aware of the two-track reporting system used in the U.S. military,[834] and agrees that giving victims control over whether to report for purposes of receiving supportive services only, or also for the purpose of launching an official investigation into the alleged sexual assault, is beneficial to sexual assault victims. These final regulations share similarities with the military's two-track reporting system; the Department desires to respect the autonomy of each alleged victim to report for the purpose of receiving supportive measures, and to decide whether or not to also request an investigation into the allegations of sexual harassment. As commenters observed, the withdrawn 2014 Q&A's approach to what happens when an alleged victim reports sexual harassment also shares similarities with the two-track reporting system used in the military. These final regulations, too, are similar in some ways to the approach taken in the withdrawn 2014 Q&A. However, the Department believes that the additional precision, and obligatory nature, of these final regulations results in an approach superior to simply reinstating prior guidance.

Under the final regulations, any person may report[835] that any individual has allegedly been victimized by conduct that could constitute sexual harassment,[836] and the recipient must respond promptly, including by offering supportive measures to the complainant (i.e., the alleged victim) and telling the complainant about the option of also filing a formal complaint that starts an investigation.[837] The only persons who can initiate an investigation are the complainant themselves, or the Title IX Coordinator.[838] Thus, if a complainant wants a report to remain confidential (in the sense of the complainant's identity

The Department believes its first priority is for victims to be treated with dignity and respect and to receive the medical treatment, mental health counseling, and the advocacy services that they deserve. Under DoD's Sexual Assault Prevention and Response (SAPR) Policy, Service members . . . have two reporting options—Restricted Reporting and Unrestricted Reporting. not being disclosed to the alleged perpetrator, and not launching an investigation), the complainant may receive supportive measures without an investigation being conducted—unless the Title IX Coordinator, after having considered the complainant's wishes, decides that it would be clearly unreasonable for the school not to investigate the complainant's allegations. On the other hand, if the complainant chooses to file a formal complaint, the school must initiate a grievance process and investigate the complainant's allegations.[839] These final regulations preserve the benefits of allowing third party reporting while still giving the complainant as much control as reasonably possible over whether the school investigates, because under the final regulations a third party can report—and trigger the Title IX Coordinator's obligation to reach out to the complainant and offer supportive measures—but the third party cannot trigger an investigation.[840] Further, the final regulations allow a complainant to initially report for the purpose of receiving supportive measures, and to later decide to file a formal complaint.

Section 106.44(a) ''Education Program or Activity''

General Support and Opposition for ''Education Program or Activity'' as a Jurisdictional Condition

Comments: Several commenters expressed support for the NPRM's approach to the ''education program or activity'' condition, stating that it is consistent with the Title IX statute and case law. Commenters asserted that the Department has appropriately recognized that whether misconduct occurs on campus or off campus is not dispositive, and that courts have similarly applied a multi-factor test to deciding whether conduct occurred in an education program or activity. One commenter cited Federal cases suggesting that sexually hostile conduct itself, and not just its consequences, must occur on campus or at a school-sponsored or supervised event for Title IX to apply.[841] One commenter expressed support for the NPRM's approach to education program or activity because it is consistent with the Department's past practice. The commenter cited Departmental determination letters involving institutions of higher education in 2004 and 2008 that stated recipients do not have a Title IX duty to address alleged misconduct that occurs off campus and that does not involve the recipient's programs or activities. A few commenters expressed support for the NPRM's approach to education program or activity, asserting that it imposes reasonable limits on recipient responsibility. One commenter asserted that schools are not the sex police and that expecting schools to have jurisdiction over activity in off-campus apartments, at a parent's house, a local bar, or nearby hotel, is unrealistic. One commenter expressed support for the NPRM's approach to including ''education program or activity'' as a condition triggering a recipient's response obligations, but urged the Department to go further and explicitly exclude from Title IX allegations made by or against someone who has no relationship with the recipient, and allegations involving students but occurring in a time or place totally unrelated to school activities such as during summer vacation hundreds of miles away from campus.

Other commenters asserted that the NPRM's approach to education program or activity was unclear. Commenters stated that the NPRM's preamble mentioned several factors, such as recipient ownership of the premises, endorsement, oversight, supervision, and disciplinary power, but argued that this multi-factor test may be confusing and make it difficult for students and schools to understand their Title IX rights and obligations. One commenter argued that the practical application of the Department's approach to misconduct that has both on-campus and off-campus elements would be challenging; for example, the commenter stated, if a sexual misconduct complaint involved a series of actions occurring on campus and off campus then the recipient may have to sift through evidence to identify and ignore events not ''in'' a program or activity.

Many commenters expressed concern that the NPRM's approach to the education program or activity condition would increase danger to students and others. Commenters cited studies and scholarly articles suggesting that sexual assault can cause lasting psychological damage to victims, including increasing suicide rates and substantially impacting victims' academic career, retention, graduation, and grade point average, regardless of whether the sexual assault occurred off campus or on campus.[842] Commenters argued that not addressing off-campus misconduct may chill reporting, make it harder for the community to know the nature of threats facing them, and even discourage young women from attending college. Commenters expressed concern that the NPRM would cause victims to leave school, asserting that over one-third of sexual harassment or assault victims drop out of school.[843] Commenters argued that because a significant number of sexual assaults occur off campus,[844] not requiring schools to respond to those assaults will only lead to more college students dropping out. Several commenters emphasized that the reality is that off-campus life is often an essential part of the educational experience, such as off-campus travel for conferences and networking events, and that off-campus living for students is quite common.[845] Commenters argued that the Department should not give a free pass to perpetrators whose abusive conduct occurs off campus. Commenters expressed concern that repeat offenders could systematically target victims, knowing they will get away with it.

Commenters raised concerns about off-campus Greek life as hotbeds of sexual misconduct not covered by the NPRM, arguing that students are more likely to experience sexual assault if in a fraternity or sorority, and that men in fraternities are more likely than other male students to be perpetrators of sexual misconduct.[846] Commenters expressed concern that recipients might interpret the NPRM as preventing them from addressing sexual misconduct in fraternities, sororities, and social clubs the recipient does not recognize,[847] or perversely encourage recipients not to recognize Greek letter associations, but that the Department should encourage such relationships because they often entail mandatory insurance, risk management standards, and training requirements to reduce incidents of sexual misconduct.

Commenters asserted that the NPRM especially increases risks to community college and vocational school students because such students generally live off campus, to students of color and other already marginalized students who may not be able to afford to live on campus, to elementary and secondary school students with disabilities who may be separated from their peers and removed to off-site services, and to LGBTQ students because it may be harder for them to find adequate outside support services. One commenter argued that the Department's exclusion of off-campus assaults will hinder Federal background check processes, potentially harming our national security and exposing co-workers to danger. Another commenter stated that the corporate world does not exclude out-of-office misconduct from company codes of conduct, and so the Department should not set young people up to fail by not showing them early in life that misconduct is unacceptable and will lead to consequences.

Commenters argued that Federal courts have been supportive of universities applying student codes of conduct to misconduct occurring off campus and outside the school's programs or activities.[848] Commenters argued that courts have recognized that an assailant's mere presence on campus creates a hostile environment for sexual harassment victims, exposing recipients to Title IX liability under a deliberate indifference standard if the recipient fails to redress the hostile environment even where the underlying sexual harassment or assault occurred off campus and outside the recipient's education program or activity. Commenters asserted that the proposed rules would leave recipients vulnerable to private Title IX lawsuits because recipients would not need to address the continuing effects of sexual assault that occurred outside the recipient's program or activity under the Department's regulations yet a Federal court may hold otherwise.[849] Commenters argued that Federal courts have determined that regardless of where a sexual assault occurred, where both parties are in the same education program or activity a recipient should be held liable under a deliberate indifference standard based on the recipient's response to the alleged incident, even if the incident happened under circumstances outside the recipient's control.[850] Commenters argued that courts have allowed Title IX private causes of action for sexual misconduct to proceed even where some or all of alleged misconduct occurred in a location outside the recipient's control so long as there was ''some nexus between the out-of-school conduct and the school'' [851] and that the proposed rules should take the same approach. Commenters argued that the Supreme Court's Gebser decision involved sexual activity between a teacher and student where the sexual activity did not take place on school grounds, yet the Supreme Court did not consider that sexual harassment to be outside the purview of Title IX.[852]

Commenters argued that the 2001 Guidance and 2017 Q&A require recipients to address sexual harassment that occurs off campus where the underlying sexual harassment or assault causes the complainant to experience a hostile environment on campus, and urged the Department to ensure that the final regulations impose similar obligations for recipients to address the continuing effects of sexual harassment that occurs off campus.

Another commenter contended that the NPRM conflicts with recent Department actions under the Trump Administration, such as cutting off partial funding to the Chicago Public School system for failing to address two reports of off-campus sexual assault.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the general support for our approach to including the concept of a recipient's ''education program or activity'' in these final regulations. The ''education program or activity'' language in the Title IX statute [853] provides context for the scope of Title IX's non-discrimination mandate, which ensures that Federal funds are not used to support discriminatory practices in education programs or activities.[854]

In Davis, the Supreme Court framed the question in that case as whether a recipient of Federal financial assistance may be liable for damages under Title IX, for failure to respond to peer-on-peer sexual harassment in the recipient's program or activity.[855] The Supreme Court in Davis continued to reference the statutory ''program or activity'' language throughout its decision [856] and refuted dissenting justices' arguments that the majority's approach permitted too much liability against recipients in part by reasoning: ''Moreover, because the harassment must occur 'under' 'the operations of' a funding recipient, see 20 U.S.C. 1681(a); § 1687 (defining 'program or activity'), the harassment must take place in a context subject to

The Department's regulatory authority must emanate from Federal law.[858] Congress, in enacting Title IX, has conferred on the Department the authority to regulate under Federal law. The appropriate place to start is the statutory text of Title IX, for ''[u]nless otherwise defined, statutory terms are generally interpreted in accordance with their ordinary meaning.'' [859] Title IX's text, 20 U.S.C. 1681(a) (emphasis added), states: ''No person in the United States shall, on the basis of sex, be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance[.]'' The Department's authority to regulate sexual harassment as a form of sex discrimination pursuant to Title IX is clear; the Supreme Court has held that sexual harassment is a form of sex discrimination, and has confirmed that Congress has directed the Department, as a Federal agency that disburses funding to education programs or activities, to establish requirements to effectuate Title IX's non-discrimination mandate.[860] The Department's authority to regulate sexual harassment depends on whether sexual harassment occurs in ''any education program or activity'' because the Department's regulatory authority is co-extensive with the scope of the Title IX statute. Title IX does not authorize the Department to regulate sex discrimination occurring anywhere but only to regulate sex discrimination in education programs or activities.[861] Congress, in the Title IX statute, provided definitions of ''program or activity'' that are reflected in the Department's current Title IX regulations.[862]

The Supreme Court has applied the ''program or activity'' language in the Title IX statute in the context of judicial enforcement of Title IX. The Department does not believe that the Supreme Court's application of ''program or activity'' in the context of sexual harassment as a form of sex discrimination is an unreasonable interpretation of the Title IX statute, because the Supreme Court applied the language of the statute including the definitions of ''program or activity'' provided in the statute. The Department thus concludes that we should align these final regulations with the Supreme Court's approach to ''education program or activity'' in the context of Title IX sexual harassment.[863] By contrast, as explained in the ''Adoption and Adaption of the Supreme Court's Framework to Address Sexual Harassment,'' the three parts of the Gebser/Davis framework (i.e., definition of sexual harassment, actual knowledge, deliberate indifference) do not appear in the text of the Title IX statute, and the Department believes that it may promulgate regulatory requirements that differ in significant ways from the Gebser/Davis framework, to best effectuate the purposes of Title IX's non-discrimination mandate in the context of administrative enforcement, and we have done so in these final regulations.

The Department acknowledges the concerns of many commenters who argued that with respect to sexual harassment, whether the alleged conduct occurred in the recipient's education program or activity might have been understood too narrowly under the NPRM (e.g., to exclude all off-campus conduct) or at least created potential confusion for complainants and recipients. In response to commenters' concerns, the Department believes that providing additional clarification as to the scope of a recipient's education program or activity for purposes of Title IX sexual harassment is necessary, and, therefore, adds to § 106.44(a) in the final regulations language similar to language used by the Court in Davis: For purposes of § 106.30, § 106.44, and § 106.45, the phrase ''education program or activity'' includes ''locations, events, or circumstances over which the recipient exercised substantial control over both the respondent and the context in which the harassment occurs'' and also includes ''any building owned or controlled by a student organization that is officially recognized by a postsecondary institution.'' The Title IX statute [864] and existing Title IX regulations,[865] already contain detailed definitions of ''program or activity'' that, among other aspects of such definitions, include ''all of the operations of'' a postsecondary institution or local education agency. The Department will interpret ''program or activity'' in these final regulations in accordance with the Title IX statutory (20 U.S.C. 1687) and regulatory definitions (34 CFR 106.2(h)), guided by the Supreme Court's language applied specifically for use in sexual harassment situations under Title IX regarding circumstances over which a recipient has control and (for postsecondary institutions) buildings owned or controlled by student organizations if the student organization is officially recognized by the postsecondary institution.[866]

While ''all of the operations of'' a recipient (per existing statutory and regulatory provisions), and the additional ''substantial control'' language in these final regulations, clearly include all incidents of sexual harassment occurring on a recipient's campus, the statutory and regulatory definitions of program or activity along with the revised language in § 106.44(a) clarify that a recipient's Title IX obligations extend to sexual harassment incidents that occur off campus if any of three conditions are met: If the off-campus incident occurs as part of the recipient's ''operations'' pursuant to 20 U.S.C. 1687 and 34 CFR 106.2(h); if the recipient exercised substantial control over the respondent and the context of alleged sexual harassment that occurred off campus pursuant to § 106.44(a); or if a sexual harassment incident occurs at [863] The Supreme Court's analysis of the ''program or activity'' statutory language was in the context of judicial enforcement, but the Department does not believe a different analysis is necessary or advisable for administrative enforcement, where the Department—like the Supreme Court—is constrained to interpret and apply the text of the statute including the definitions of ''program or activity'' provided in the statute. Consistent with this position, and as discussed throughout this preamble, we have revised § 106.44(a) to clarify that ''education program or activity'' for purposes of these sexual harassment regulations includes circumstances wherein the recipient exercises substantial control over both the harasser and the context of the harassment—the same conclusion reached by the Davis Court when it applied the ''program or activity'' statutory language to the context of a school's response to sexual harassment. Davis, 526 U.S. at 645.

[866] Section 106.44(a) (adding ''For purposes of this section, § 106.30, and § 106.45, 'education program or activity' includes locations, events, or circumstances over which the recipient exercised substantial control over both the respondent and the context in which the harassment occurs, and also includes any building owned or controlled by a student organization that is officially recognized by a postsecondary institution.'').

an off-campus building owned or controlled by a student organization officially recognized by a postsecondary institution pursuant to § 106.44(a).

The NPRM cited to Federal court opinions that have considered whether sexual harassment occurred in a recipient's education program or activity by examining factors such as whether the recipient funded, promoted, or sponsored the event or circumstance where the alleged harassment occurred. While it may be helpful or useful for recipients to consider factors applied by Federal courts to determine the scope of a recipient's program or activity, no single factor is determinative to conclude whether a recipient exercised substantial control over the respondent and the context in which the harassment occurred, or whether an incident occurred as part of ''all of the operations of'' a school, college, or university.

The revised language in § 106.44(a) also specifically addresses commenters' concerns about recognized student organizations that own and control buildings such as some fraternities and sororities operating from off-campus locations where sexual harassment and assault may occur with frequency. The revised language further addresses commenters' questions regarding whether postsecondary institutions' Title IX obligations are triggered when sexual harassment occurs in an off-campus location not owned by the postsecondary institution but that is in use by a student organization that the institution chooses to officially recognize such as a fraternity or sorority. The revisions to § 106.44(a) clarify that where a postsecondary institution has officially recognized a student organization, the recipient's Title IX obligations apply to sexual harassment that occurs in buildings owned or controlled by such a student organization, irrespective of whether the building is on campus or off campus, and irrespective of whether the recipient exercised substantial control over the respondent and the context of the harassment outside the fact of officially recognizing the fraternity or sorority that owns or controls the building. The Department makes this revision to promulgate a bright line rule that decisively responds to commenters and provides clarity with respect to recipient-recognized student organizations that own or control off-campus buildings. Official recognition of a student organization, alone, does not conclusively determine whether all the events and actions of the students in the organization become a part of a recipient's education program or activity; however, the Department believes that a reasonable, bright line rule is that official recognition of a student organization brings buildings owned or controlled by the organization under the auspices of the postsecondary institution recipient and thus within the scope of the recipient's Title IX obligations. As part of the process for official recognition, a postsecondary institution may require a student organization that owns or controls a building to agree to abide by the recipient's Title IX policy and procedures under these final regulations, including as to any misconduct that occurs in the building owned or controlled by a student organization. Accordingly, postsecondary institutions may not ignore sexual harassment that occurs in buildings owned or controlled by recognized student organizations. The Department acknowledges that even though postsecondary institutions may not always control what occurs in an off campus building owned or controlled by a recognized student organization, such student organizations and the events in their buildings often become an integral part of campus life. The Department also acknowledges that a postsecondary institution may be limited in its ability to gather evidence during an investigation if the incident occurs off campus on private property that a student organization (but not the institution) owns or controls. A postsecondary institution, however, may still investigate a formal complaint arising from sexual harassment occurring in a building owned or controlled by a recognized student organization (whether the building is on campus or off campus), for instance by interviewing students who were allegedly involved in the incident and who are a part of the officially recognized student organization. Thus, under the final regulations (e.g., § 106.44(b)(1)) a postsecondary institution must investigate formal complaints alleging sexual harassment that occurred in a fraternity or sorority building (located on campus, or off campus) owned by the fraternity or sorority, if the postsecondary institution has officially recognized that Greek life organization. Further, under § 106.44(a) the recipient must offer supportive measures to a complainant alleged to be the victim of sexual harassment occurring at a building owned or controlled by an officially recognized student organization. Where a postsecondary institution has officially recognized a student organization, and sexual harassment occurs in an off campus location not owned or controlled by the student organization yet involving members of the officially recognized student organization, the recipient's Title IX obligations will depend on whether the recipient exercised substantial control over the respondent and the context of the harassment, or whether the circumstances may otherwise be determined to have been part of the ''operations of'' the recipient.

We note that the revision in § 106.44(a) referencing a ''building owned or controlled by a student organization that is officially recognized by a postsecondary institution'' is not the same as, and should not be confused with, the Clery Act's use of the term ''noncampus building or property,'' even though that phrase is defined under the Clery Act in part by reference to student organizations officially recognized by an institution.[867] For example, ''education program or activity'' in these final regulations includes buildings within the confines of the campus on land owned by the institution that the institution may rent to a recognized student organization.[868] As discussed in the ''Clery Act'' subsection of the ''Miscellaneous'' section of this preamble, the Clery Act and Title IX serve distinct purposes, and Clery Act geography is not co-extensive with the scope of a recipient's education program or activity under Title IX.

With respect to commenters who suggested that the final regulations should not apply to sexual misconduct by or against an individual with no relationship to the recipient, the Department believes that the framework adopted in the final regulations appropriately effectuates the broad non-discrimination mandate of Title IX (which protects any ''person'' from discrimination in an education program or activity) while also ensuring that recipients are responsible for addressing sexual harassment occurring in an educational institution's ''operations,'' or when the recipient has control over the situation, or where a postsecondary institution has recognized a student organization thereby lending the recipient's implicit extension of responsibility over circumstances involving sexual harassment that occurs in buildings owned or controlled by such a student organization. Like the ''no person'' language in the Title IX statute, the final regulations place no restriction on the identity of a complainant (§ 106.30 defines complainant to mean ''an individual who is alleged to be the victim of conduct that could constitute sexual harassment''), obligating a recipient to respond to such a complainant regardless of the complainant's relationship to the recipient. Similarly, reflecting that the Title IX statute does not limit commission of prohibited discrimination only to certain individuals affiliated with a recipient, the final regulations define a respondent to mean ''an individual who has been reported to be the perpetrator of conduct that could constitute sexual harassment'' without restricting a respondent to being a person enrolled or employed by the recipient or who has any other affiliation or connection with the recipient.

However, the final regulations do require that in order to file a formal complaint, the complainant must be ''participating in or attempting to participate in'' the recipient's education program or activity at the time the formal complaint is filed.[869] This prevents recipients from being legally obligated to investigate allegations made by complainants who have no relationship with the recipient, yet still protects those complainants by requiring the recipient to respond promptly in a non-deliberately indifferent manner. For similar reasons, the final regulations provide in § 106.45(b)(3)(ii) that a recipient may in its discretion dismiss a formal complaint if the respondent is no longer enrolled or employed by the recipient, recognizing that a recipient's general obligation to provide a complainant with a prompt, non-deliberately indifferent response might not include completing a grievance process in a situation where the recipient lacks any disciplinary authority over the respondent.

In response to commenters' concerns that practical application of the ''education program or activity'' condition might be challenging in situations that, for example, involve some conduct occurring in the recipient's education program or activity and some conduct occurring outside the recipient's education program or activity, the Department reiterates that ''off campus'' does not automatically mean that the incident occurred outside the recipient's education program or activity. The Department agrees that recipients are obliged to think through the scope of each recipient's own education program or activity in light of the statutory and regulatory definitions of ''program or activity'' (20 U.S.C. 1687 and 34 CFR 106.2(h)) and the statement in § 106.44(a) that ''education program or activity'' includes locations, events, or circumstances over which the recipient exercised substantial control over both the respondent and the context in which the harassment occurs as well as buildings owned or controlled by student organizations officially recognized by a postsecondary institution.

To ensure that recipients adequately consider the resulting coverage of Title IX to each recipient's particular circumstances, the final regulations require that every Title IX Coordinator, investigator, decision-maker, and person who facilitates an informal resolution process, must be trained on (among other things) ''the scope of the recipient's education program or activity.'' [870] We have also revised § 106.45(b)(10)(i)(D) so that materials used to train Title IX personnel must be posted on a recipient's website. These revisions ensure that a recipient's students and employees, and the public, understand the scope of the recipient's education program or activity for purposes of Title IX. Under Title IX, recipients must operate education programs or activities free from sex discrimination, and the Department will enforce these final regulations vigorously with respect to a recipient's obligation to respond to sexual harassment that occurs in the recipient's education program or activity.

In situations involving some allegations of conduct that occurred in an education program or activity, and some allegations of conduct that did not, the recipient must investigate the allegations of conduct that occurred in the recipient's education program or activity, and nothing in the final regulations precludes the recipient from choosing to also address allegations of conduct outside the recipient's education program or activity.[871] For example, if a student is sexually assaulted outside of an education program or activity but subsequently suffers Title IX sexual harassment in an education program or activity, then these final regulations apply to the latter act of sexual harassment, and the recipient may choose to address the prior assault through its own code of conduct. Nothing in the final regulations prohibits a recipient from resolving allegations of conduct outside the recipient's education program or activity by applying the same grievance process required under § 106.45 for formal complaints of Title IX sexual harassment, even though such a process would not be required under Title IX or these final regulations. Thus, a recipient is not required by these final regulations to inefficiently extricate conduct occurring outside an education program or activity from conduct occurring in an education program or activity arising from the same facts or circumstances in order to meet the recipient's obligations with respect to the latter.

The Department appreciates the various concerns raised by many commenters regarding the extent to which students reside or spend time off campus and how the application of the ''education program or activity'' condition may affect students who experience sexual harassment and sexual assault in off-campus situations, including community college students, vocational school students, and students who belong to marginalized demographic groups. The Department reiterates that the final regulations do not impose a geographic test or draw a distinction between on-campus misconduct and off-campus misconduct. As discussed above, whether conduct occurs in a recipient's education program or activity does not necessarily depend on the geographic location of the incident. Instead, ''education program or activity'' relies on statutory and regulatory definitions of ''program or activity,'' [872] on the statement adapted from the Supreme Court's language in Davis added to [869] A complainant may be ''attempting to participate'' in the recipient's education program or activity, for example, where the complainant has applied for admission, or where the complainant has withdrawn but indicates a desire to re-enroll if the recipient appropriately responds to sexual harassment allegations.

[871] Section 106.45(b)(3) (revised in the final regulations to expressly state that although a recipient must dismiss allegations about conduct that did not occur in the recipient's education program or activity, such a mandatory dismissal is ''for purposes of sexual harassment under title IX or this part; such a dismissal does not preclude action under another provision of the recipient's code of conduct.'').

[872] E.g., 20 U.S.C. 1687; 34 CFR 106.2(h).

§ 106.44(a) that education program or activity includes locations, events, or circumstances over which the recipient exercised substantial control over the respondent and over the context in which the sexual harassment occurred, and includes on-campus and off-campus buildings owned or controlled by a student organization officially recognized by a postsecondary institution. If a sexual assault occurs against a student outside of an education program or activity, and the student later experiences Title IX sexual harassment in an education program or activity, then a recipient with actual knowledge of such sexual harassment in the recipient's education program or activity must respond pursuant to § 106.44(a).

The final regulations' approach reduces confusion for recipients and students as to the scope of Title IX's protective coverage and recognizes the Department's administrative role in enforcing this important civil rights law according to the statute's plain terms. Furthermore, as noted previously, nothing in the final regulations prevents recipients from initiating a student conduct proceeding or offering supportive measures to students affected by sexual harassment that occurs outside the recipient's education program or activity. Title IX is not the exclusive remedy for sexual misconduct or traumatic events that affect students. As to misconduct that falls outside the ambit of Title IX, nothing in the final regulations precludes recipients from vigorously addressing misconduct (sexual or otherwise) that occurs outside the scope of Title IX or from offering supportive measures to students and individuals impacted by misconduct or trauma even when Title IX and its implementing regulations do not require such actions.[873] The Department emphasizes that sexual misconduct is unacceptable regardless of the circumstances in which it occurs, and recognizing jurisdictional limitations on the purview of a statute does not equate to condoning any form of sexual misconduct.

The Department believes a commenter's concern regarding the negative effect of the final regulations on the Federal background check process and our national security to be speculative. The final regulations would not categorically exclude off-campus assaults. As discussed previously, the final regulations applies to off-campus sexual harassment that occurs under ''the operations of'' the recipient, or where the recipient exercised substantial control over the respondent and the context in which the sexual harassment occurred, or in a building owned or controlled by a student organization officially recognized by a postsecondary institution. This commenter appears to have made a series of assumptions that may not be true, including that a significant number of off-campus assaults not covered by the final regulations would involve perpetrators subjected to a Federal background check in the future, and that a significant number of background checks would fail to uncover relevant information about sexual misconduct solely because the perpetrator's misconduct was not covered under Title IX. Again, the Department emphasizes that nothing in the final regulations prevents recipients from addressing sexual misconduct that occurs outside their education programs or activities, nor do the final regulations discourage or prevent a victim from reporting sexual misconduct to law enforcement or from filing a civil lawsuit; therefore, numerous avenues exist through which misconduct not covered under Title IX would be revealed during a Federal background check of the perpetrator.

With respect to a commenter's assertion that the final regulations may perversely incentivize recipients to not recognize fraternities and sororities, the Department believes this conclusion would require assuming that recipients will make decisions affecting the quality of life of their students based solely on whether or not recipient recognition of a student organization such as a fraternity or sorority would result in sexual harassment that occurs at locations affiliated with that organization falling under Title IX's scope. The Department does not make such an assumption, believing instead that recipients take many factors into account in deciding whether, and under what conditions, a recipient wishes to officially recognize a student organization. Whether or not these final regulations alter postsecondary institutions' decisions about recognizing Greek life organizations, the Department has determined that the scope of Title IX extends to the entirety of a recipient's education program and activity, and with respect to postsecondary institutions, the Department is persuaded by commenters' contentions that when a postsecondary institution chooses to officially recognize a student organization, the recipient has implied to its students and employees that locations owned by such a student organization are under the imprimatur of the recipient, whether or not the recipient otherwise exercises substantial control over such a location.

The Department believes there is a fundamental distinction between Title IX, and workplace policies that may exist in the corporate world. Title IX has clear jurisdictional application to education programs or activities, and the Department does not have authority to extend Title IX's application. By contrast, corporations may have more flexibility in crafting their own rules and policies to reflect their values and the needs of their employees and customers. Further, Title VII does not necessarily deem actionable all sexual harassment committed by employees regardless of the location or context of the harassment.[874] These final regulations tether sexual harassment to a recipient's education program or activity in a similar manner to the way courts tether sexual harassment to a workplace under an employer's control.[875] Regardless of any differences between analyses under Title VII and Title IX, we emphasize that recipients retain discretion under the final regulations to address sexual misconduct that falls outside the recipient's education program or activity through their own disciplinary system and by offering supportive [873] As discussed in the ''Directed Question 5: Individuals with Disabilities'' subsection of the ''Directed Questions'' section of this preamble, nothing in these final regulations affects a recipient's obligations to comply with all applicable disability laws, such as the ADA. Thus, for example, if a recipient's student (or employee) has a disability caused or exacerbated by, or arising from, sexual harassment, a recipient must comply with applicable disability laws (including with respect to providing reasonable accommodations) irrespective of whether the sexual harassment that caused or exacerbated the individual's disability constitutes Title IX sexual harassment to which the recipient must respond under these final regulations.

[874] See, e.g., Lapka v. Chertoff, 517 F.3d 974, 982–83 (7th Cir. 2008).

[875] The Department adds to § 106.44(a) the statement that ''education program or activity'' includes locations, events, or circumstances over which the recipient exercised substantial control over both the respondent and the context in which the harassment occurs. This helps clarify that even if a situation arises off campus, it may still be part of the recipient's education program or activity if the recipient exercised substantial control over the context and the alleged harasser. While such situations may be fact specific, recipients must consider whether, for example, a sexual harassment incident between two students that occurs in an off-campus apartment (i.e., not a dorm room provided by the recipient) is a situation over which the recipient exercised substantial control; if so, the recipient must respond when it has actual knowledge of sexual harassment or allegations of sexual harassment that occurred there. At the same time, the Title IX statute and existing regulations broadly define a recipient's ''program or activity'' to include (as to schools) ''all of the operations'' of the school, such that situations that arise on campus are already part of a school's education program or activity. 20 U.S.C. 1687.

measures to complainants reporting such misconduct.

The Department acknowledges commenters' citations to Federal court opinions for the proposition that a recipient may be deliberately indifferent to sexual harassment that occurred outside the recipient's control where the complainant has to interact with the respondent in the recipient's education program or activity, or where the effects of the underlying sexual assault create a hostile environment in the complainant's workplace or educational environment. However, with the changes to the final regulations made in response to commenters' concerns, the Department believes that we have clarified that sexual harassment incidents occurring off campus may fall under Title IX. The statutory and regulatory definitions of ''program or activity'' and the statements regarding ''substantial control'' and ''buildings owned or controlled by'' student organizations officially recognized by postsecondary institutions in § 106.44(a) do not state or imply that off-campus incidents necessarily fall outside a recipient's education program or activity. Moreover, complainants can request supportive measures or an investigation into allegations of conduct that do not meet Title IX jurisdictional conditions, under a recipient's own code of conduct.[876]

Some of the situations in Federal cases cited to by commenters may have reached similar outcomes under the final regulations. For example, in Doe v. East Haven Board of Education,[877] the Second Circuit held that the plaintiff sufficiently alleged sexual harassment to which the school was deliberately indifferent where the harassment consisted of on-campus taunts and name-calling directed at the plaintiff after she had reported being raped off campus by two high-school boys. The final regulations would similarly analyze whether sexual harassment (i.e., unwelcome conduct on the basis of sex so severe, pervasive, and objectively offensive that it effectively deprives a complainant of equal access to education) in the recipient's program or activity triggered a recipient's response obligations regardless of whether such sexual harassment stemmed from the complainant's allegations of having suffered sexual assault (e.g., rape) outside the recipient's program or activity. Further, whether or not the off-campus rape in that case was in, or outside, the school's education program or activity, would depend on the factual circumstances, because as explained above, not all off-campus sexual harassment is excluded from Title IX coverage.

Contrary to commenters' assertions, the Supreme Court in Gebser did not dispense with the program or activity limitation or declare that where the harassment occurred did not matter. The facts at issue in the Gebser case involved teacher-on-student harassment that consisted of both in-class sexual comments directed at the plaintiff as well as a sexual relationship that began when the respondent-teacher visited the plaintiff's home ostensibly to give her a book.[878] The Supreme Court in Gebser emphasized that a school district needs to be aware of discrimination (in the form of sexual harassment) ''in its programs'' and emphasized that a teacher's sexual abuse of a student ''undermines the basic purposes of the educational system'' [879] thereby implicitly recognizing that a teacher's sexual harassment of a student is likely to constitute sexual harassment ''in the program'' of the school even if the harassment occurs off campus. Nothing in the final regulations contradicts this premise or conclusion; § 106.44(a) clarifies that a recipient's education program or activity includes circumstances over which a recipient has substantial control over the context of the harassment and the respondent, and a teacher employed by a recipient who visits a student's home ostensibly to give the student a book but in reality to instigate sexual activity with the student could constitute sexual harassment ''in the program'' of the recipient such that a recipient with actual knowledge of that harassment would be obligated under the final regulations to respond. Similarly, the Supreme Court in Davis viewed the perpetrator's status as a teacher in Gebser as relevant to concluding that the sexual harassment was happening ''under'' the recipient's education program or activity.[880] We reiterate that the final regulations do not distinguish between sexual harassment occurring ''on campus'' versus ''off campus'' but rather state that Title IX covers sexual harassment that occurs in a recipient's education program or activity. The final regulations follow the Gebser/Davis approach to Title IX's statutory reference to discrimination in an education program or activity; sexual harassment by a teacher as opposed to harassment by a fellow student may, as indicated in Gebser and Davis, affect whether the sexual harassment occurred ''under any education program or activity.'' [881] This is a matter that recipients must consider when training Title IX personnel on the ''scope of the [876] The Department also notes that § 106.45(b)(8) in the final regulations permits complainants and respondents equally to appeal a recipient's determination that allegations were subject to mandatory dismissal under § 106.45(b)(3)(i).

[877] 200 F. App'x 46, 48 (2d Cir. 2006); Lapka v. Chertoff, 517 F.3d 974, 982–83 (7th Cir. 2008) (the Seventh Circuit reasoned that the plaintiff sufficiently alleged workplace harassment even though the alleged rape occurred while the plaintiff and assailant were socializing after hours in a private hotel room, because the bar was part of the training facility where the plaintiff and assailant were required to attend work-related training sessions and thus were on ''official duty'' while at that facility, including the bar located in the facility, ''so the event could be said to have grown out of the workplace environment'' and the plaintiff and assailant were trainees expected to eat and drink at the facility and ''return to dormitories and hotel rooms provided by'' the employer such that ''[e]mployees in these situations can be expected to band together for society and socialize as a matter of course'' justifying the Court's conclusion that the plaintiff had alleged sexual harassment (rape) that arose in the context of a workplace environment and to which the employer had an obligation to respond). Although Lapka was a case under Title VII, the final regulations would similarly analyze whether sexual harassment occurred in the school's program or activity by inquiring whether the school exercised substantial control over the context of the harassment and the alleged harasser.

recipient's education program or activity'' pursuant to § 106.45(b)(1)(iii).

Both the 2001 Guidance and 2017 Q&A recognize the statutory language of ''education program or activity'' as a limitation on sexual harassment to which a recipient must respond. For example, the 2001 Guidance notes that ''Title IX applies to all public and private educational institutions that receive Federal funds'' and states that the ''education program or activity of a school includes all of the school's operations'' which means ''that Title IX protects students in connection with all of the academic, educational, extra-curricular, athletic, and other programs of the school, whether they take place in the facilities of the school, on a school bus, at a class or training program sponsored by the school at another location, or elsewhere.'' [882] Similarly, the 2017 Q&A expressly acknowledges that a recipient's obligation to respond to sexual harassment is confined to harassment that occurs in the recipient's education program or activity, citing statutory and regulatory definitions of ''recipient,'' ''operations,'' and ''program or activity.'' [883] The final regulations similarly rely on preexisting statutory and regulatory definitions of a recipient's ''program or activity'' and add a statement that ''education program or activity'' includes circumstances over which the recipient exercised substantial control. The withdrawn 2011 Dear Colleague Letter departed from the Department's longstanding acknowledgement that a recipient's response obligations are conditioned on sexual harassment that occurs in the recipient's education program or activity; [884] these final regulations return to the Department's approach in the 2001 Guidance, which mirrors the Supreme Court's approach to ''education program or activity'' as a jurisdictional condition that promotes a recipient's obligation under Title IX to provide education programs or activities free from sex discrimination. Like the 2001 Guidance, the final regulations approach the ''education program or activity'' condition as extending to circumstances over which recipients have substantial control, and not only to incidents that occur ''on campus.'' We reiterate that nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient from offering supportive measures to a complainant who reports sexual harassment that occurred outside the recipient's education program or activity, and any sexual harassment that does occur in an education program or activity must be responded to even if it relates to, or happens subsequent to, sexual harassment that occurred outside the education program or activity.

Although the 2001 Guidance and 2017 Q&A frame actionable sexual harassment as harassment that creates a ''hostile environment,'' [885] the final regulations utilize the more precise interpretation of Title IX's scope articulated by the Supreme Court in Davis: That a recipient must respond to sexual harassment that is so severe, pervasive, and objectively offensive that it effectively denies a person equal access to education.[886] The use of the phrase ''hostile environment'' in the 2001 Guidance and 2017 Q&A does not mean that those guidance documents ignored the ''education program or activity'' limitation referenced in the Title IX statute; whether framed as a ''hostile environment'' (as in Department guidance) or as ''effective denial of a person's equal access'' to education (as in these final regulations), sexual harassment is a form of sex discrimination actionable under Title IX when it occurs in an education program or activity.

Because the final regulations do not exclude ''off campus'' sexual harassment from coverage under Title IX and instead take the approach utilized in the 2001 Guidance and applied by the Supreme Court in Davis, under which off campus sexual harassment may be in the scope of a recipient's education program or activity, the Department disagrees that these final regulations conflict with the Department's recent enforcement action with respect to holding Chicago Public Schools accountable for failure to appropriately respond to certain off-campus sexual assaults.

Changes: Section 106.44(a) is revised to state that ''education program or activity'' includes locations, events, or circumstances over which the recipient exercised substantial control over both the respondent and the context in which the harassment occurs, and also includes any building owned or controlled by a student organization that is officially recognized by a postsecondary institution. Section 106.45(b)(1)(iii) is revised to include training for Title IX Coordinators, investigators, decision-makers, and persons who facilitate informal resolutions on ''the scope of the recipient's education program or activity.'' Section 106.45(b)(3)(i) is revised to expressly provide that a mandatory dismissal of allegations in a formal complaint about conduct not occurring in the recipient's education program or activity is ''for purposes of title IX or [34 CFR part 106]; such a dismissal does not preclude action under another provision of the recipient's code of conduct.'' Section 106.45(b)(10)(i)(D) is revised to require recipients to post materials used to train Title IX personnel on the recipient's website, or if the recipient does not have a website, to make such materials available for inspection and review by members of the public.

If a student files a complaint with the school, regardless of where the conduct occurred, the school must process the complaint in accordance with its established procedures. Because students often experience the continuing effects of off-campus sexual harassment in the educational setting, schools should consider the effects of the off-campus conduct when evaluating whether there is a hostile environment on campus. For example, if a student alleges that he or she was sexually assaulted by another student off school grounds, and that upon returning to school he or she was taunted and harassed by other students who are the alleged perpetrator's friends, the school should take the earlier sexual assault into account in determining whether there is a sexually hostile environment. conduct.[887] Other commenters cited cases holding that recipients may be liable under Title IX for failing to adequately address online harassment.[888] A few commenters argued that the NPRM's approach to education program or activity is inconsistent with the Department's past practice and guidance documents, such as guidance issued in 2010 which acknowledged that cell phone and internet communications may constitute actionable harassment. Many commenters were concerned the NPRM would exclude online sexual harassment due to the education program or activity condition in § 106.44(a), and cited studies showing the prevalence and effects of online harassment and cyber-bullying on victims.[889] Commenters argued that it was unclear to what extent the NPRM would cover online harassment and suggested that the Department more broadly define ''program or activity'' to include student interactions that are enabled by recipients, such as online harassment between students using internet access provided by the recipient. Commenters argued that the final regulations should explicitly address cyber-bullying and electronic speech. Some commenters suggested that excluding online misconduct may conflict with State law; for example, commenters stated that New Jersey law includes harassment occurring online.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' concerns about whether Title IX applies to sexual harassment that occurs electronically or online. We emphasize that the education program or activity jurisdictional condition is a fact-specific inquiry applying existing statutory and regulatory definitions of ''program or activity'' to the situation; however, for recipients who are postsecondary institutions or elementary and secondary schools as those terms are used in the final regulations, the statutory and regulatory definitions of ''program or activity'' encompass ''all of the operations of'' such recipients, and such ''operations'' may certainly include computer and internet networks, digital platforms, and computer hardware or software owned or operated by, or used in the operations of, the recipient.[890] Furthermore, the final regulations revise § 106.44(a) to specify that an education program or activity includes circumstances over which the recipient exercised substantial control over both the respondent and the context in which the harassment occurred, such that the factual circumstances of online harassment must be analyzed to determine if it occurred in an education program or activity. For example, a student using a personal device to perpetrate online sexual harassment during class time may constitute a circumstance over which the recipient exercises substantial control.

Contrary to the claims made by some commenters, the approach to ''education program or activity'' contained in the final regulations, and in particular its potential application to online harassment, would not necessarily conflict with the Department's previous 2010 Dear Colleague Letter addressing bullying and harassment. The Department's 2010 guidance made a passing reference that harassing conduct may include ''use of cell phones or the internet,'' and the Department's position has not changed in this regard.[891] These final regulations apply to sexual harassment perpetrated through use of cell phones or the internet if sexual harassment occurred in the recipient's education program or activity. As explained in the ''Adoption and Adaption of the Supreme Court's Framework to Address Sexual Harassment'' section of this preamble, these final regulations adopt and adapt the Gebser/Davis framework of actual knowledge and deliberate indifference, in contrast to the rubric in the 2010 Dear Colleague Letter on bullying and harassment; however, these final regulations appropriately address electronic, digital, or online sexual harassment by not making sexually harassing conduct contingent on the method by which the conduct is perpetrated. Additionally, even if a recipient is not required to address certain misconduct under these final regulations, these final regulations expressly allow a recipient to address such misconduct under its own code of conduct.[892] Accordingly, there may not be any conflict between these final regulations with respect to State laws that explicitly cover online harassment.

Changes: None.

Consistency With Title IX Statutory Text

Comments: Some commenters opposed the NPRM's approach to ''education program or activity'' by arguing that it conflicts with Title IX's statutory text. Commenters contended that the NPRM is an unambiguously incorrect interpretation of Title IX under the deference doctrine articulated by the Supreme Court in Chevron U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc.,[893] and will thus be given no judicial deference. One such commenter asserted that the Title IX statute has three distinctive protective categories, such that no person on the basis of sex can be: (1) Excluded from participation in; (2) denied the benefits of; or (3) subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity. The commenter argued that the first clause includes off-campus conduct, such as male students on a public street blocking female students from accessing campus. This commenter argued that the third clause prohibits discrimination ''under,'' and not ''in'' or ''within,'' a recipient's education program or activity and is violated whenever women or girls are subjected to more adverse conditions than males. This commenter asserted that the Title IX statutory text does not depend on where the underlying conduct occurs, but rather focuses on the subsequent hostile educational environment that such misconduct can cause.

Another commenter argued that requiring recipients to treat off-campus sexual misconduct differently from on-campus sexual misconduct can itself violate Title IX.

Discussion: The Department acknowledges the analysis offered by at least one commenter that the Title IX statute, by its own text, has three distinct protective categories and the commenter's argument that the ''subjected to discrimination'' prong is violated whenever females are subjected to more adverse conditions than males. As explained below, the Department elects to adopt the analysis applied by the Supreme Court rather than the analysis provided by the commenter.

Federal financial assistance.[894] The Davis Court characterized sexual harassment as a form of sex discrimination under Title IX,[895] and reasoned that whether a recipient is liable for sexual harassment thus turns on whether the recipient can be said to have ''subjected'' students to sex discrimination in the form of sexual harassment.[896] The Davis Court further reasoned, ''Moreover, because the harassment must occur 'under' 'the operations of' a funding recipient, see 20 U.S.C. 1681(a); § 1687 (defining 'program or activity'), the harassment must take place in a context subject to the school district's control. . . . These factors combine to limit a recipient's damages liability to circumstances wherein the recipient exercises substantial control over both the harasser and the context in which the known harassment occurs.'' [897]

Adopting the Supreme Court's analysis of the appropriate application of the Title IX statute's ''program or activity'' language in the context of sexual harassment, the final regulations treat sexual harassment as a form of sex discrimination under Title IX and hold recipients accountable for responding to sexual harassment that took place in a context under the recipient's control. In interpreting ''education program or activity'' in the final regulations, the Department will look to the definitions of ''program or activity'' provided by Title IX [898] and existing Title IX regulations,[899] and has revised § 106.44(a) of the final regulations to clarify that ''education program or activity'' includes locations, events, or circumstances over which the recipient exercised substantial control over both the respondent and the context in which the harassment occurs, as well as on-campus and off-campus buildings owned or controlled by student organizations officially recognized by postsecondary institutions. The Department notes that the commenter's hypothetical, concerning male students on a public street blocking female students from accessing campus, would require a fact-specific analysis but could constitute sexual harassment in the recipient's education program or activity if such an incident occurred in a location, event, or circumstance over which the recipient exercised substantial control.

Contrary to the claims made by some commenters, and as discussed above, the final regulations would not necessarily require recipients to treat off-campus misconduct differently from on-campus misconduct. Title IX does not create, nor did Congress intend for it to create, open-ended liability for recipients in addressing sexual harassment. Rather, the statute imposed an important jurisdictional limitation through its reference to education programs or activities. Recipients are responsible under Title IX for addressing sex discrimination, including sexual harassment, in their ''education program or activity,'' but a recipient's education program or activity may extend to locations, events, and circumstances ''off campus.''

Changes: We have revised § 106.44(a) to state that for purposes of §§ 106.30, 106.44, and 106.45, ''education program or activity'' includes locations, events, or circumstances over which the respondent had substantial control over both the respondent and the context in which the sexual harassment occurred, and also includes buildings owned or controlled by student organizations that are officially recognized by a postsecondary institution.

Constitutional Equal Protection

Comments: One commenter contended that the NPRM's approach to ''education program or activity'' may violate the Fourteenth Amendment because experiencing off-campus or online sexual victimization detrimentally affects student-survivors' education, and the Fourteenth Amendment guarantees these students equal protection, yet, the commenter argued, the NPRM would leave these students outside Title IX's reach and deprived of equal protection.

Discussion: We disagree with the contention that the application in the final regulations of ''education program or activity'' as a jurisdictional condition may violate the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The Department reiterates that the ''education program or activity'' limitation in the final regulations does not create or apply a geographic test, does not draw a line between ''off campus'' and ''on campus,'' and does not create a distinction between sexual harassment occurring in person versus online. Moreover, under these final regulations, any individual alleged to be a victim of conduct that could constitute sexual harassment is a ''complainant'' [900] to whom the recipient must respond in a prompt, non-deliberately indifferent manner; in that manner, all students are treated equally without distinction under the final regulations based on, for example, where a student resides or spends time. The distinction of which some commenters are critical, then, is not a distinction drawn among groups or types of students, but rather is a distinction drawn (for reasons explained previously) between incidents that are, or are not, under the control of the recipient. The Department further notes that even if commenters correctly characterize the distinction as being made between some students (who suffer harassment in an education program or activity) and other students (who suffer harassment outside an education program or activity), the applicable level of scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause to any differential treatment under such circumstances would be the rational basis test.[901] A heightened level of scrutiny would apply where a suspect or quasi-suspect classification is involved, such as race or sex.[902] But, as here, where no such suspect or quasi-suspect classification is involved, the final regulations may treat students differently due to the circumstances in which the misconduct occurred, and the rational basis test applies. Under the rational basis test, a law or governmental action is valid under the Equal Protection Clause so long as it is rationally related to a legitimate government interest.[903] With Title IX, Congress made a rational determination that recipients should be held liable for misconduct over which they had some level of control. The statute's reference to ''education program or activity'' reflects this important limitation. To expose recipients to liability for misconduct wholly unrelated to circumstances over which they have control would contravene congressional intent and lead to potentially unlimited exposure to loss of Federal funds. The Department believes that the use of ''education program or activity'' in § 106.44(a) appropriately reflects both statutory text and congressional intent, and furthers the legitimate government interest of ensuring liability is not open-ended and has reasonable jurisdictional limitations.

Changes: None.

Institutional Autonomy and Litigation Risk

Comments: A number of commenters stated that the Department's approach to ''education program or activity'' would undermine recipient autonomy and expose recipients to litigation risk. Commenters argued that recipients should have the right to determine the standards of behavior to which their students must adhere, both on campus and off campus, and that the NPRM would infringe on institutional academic prerogatives and independence. Commenters expressed concern that the NPRM would make recipients vulnerable to litigation from students seeking damages for off-campus assaults, including because recipients could be accused of arbitrarily deciding which cases to investigate and which cases to declare outside their jurisdiction.

Discussion: We acknowledge the importance of recipient discretion and flexibility to determine the recipient's own standards of conduct. However, Congress created a clear mandate in Title IX and vested the Department with the authority to administratively enforce Title IX to effectuate the statute's twin purposes: To ''avoid the use of Federal resources to support discriminatory practices'' and to ''provide individual citizens effective protection against those practices.'' [904] Importantly, nothing in the final regulations prohibits recipients from using their own disciplinary processes to address misconduct occurring outside their education program or activity.[905] Indeed, this flexibility for recipients to address sexual misconduct that falls outside the scope of Title IX, including sexual misconduct that is outside the recipient's education program or activity, permits recipients to reduce the litigation risk perceived by some commenters. As discussed above, and contrary to the claims made by many commenters, the final regulations do not distinguish between on-campus misconduct and off-campus misconduct. Off-campus sexual harassment is not categorically excluded from Title IX coverage. Recipients' decisions to investigate formal complaints regarding allegations of sexual harassment cannot be arbitrary under the final regulations; rather, a recipient must investigate a formal complaint where the alleged sexual harassment (meeting the definition in § 106.30) occurred in the recipient's education program or activity, against a person in the United States.

Changes: None.

Requests for Clarification

Comments: Commenters raised questions regarding the Department's approach to the ''education program or activity'' condition. Commenters requested clarity as to events that begin off campus but have effects on campus, such as interaction among students, faculty, and staff outside formal professional or academic activities. These commenters were concerned that, in such circumstances, it may be challenging for an institution to clearly and consistently identify what conduct has occurred strictly within its education program and which conduct is beyond its educational program. One commenter sought clarification as to what, if any, are the Department's expectations for a recipient's conduct processes that address off-campus sexual misconduct. This commenter asserted that Title IX prohibits discrimination ''under'' an education program or activity, but that § 106.44(a) and proposed § 106.44(b)(4) referred to sexual harassment ''in'' an education program or activity, while proposed § 106.45(b)(3) referred to sexual harassment ''within'' a program or activity. The commenter inquired as to whether ''in'' differs from ''within'' in those proposed sections, and whether those terms mean something different than ''under'' used in the Title IX statute, and if so what are the differences in meaning. The commenter asserted that Title IX prohibits ''discrimination'' under an education program or activity and that § 106.44(a) and proposed § 106.44(b)(2) refer to ''sexual harassment'' in an education program or activity, and asked if recipients would be required to respond where sexual harassment occurred outside an education program or activity but resulted in discrimination under the education program or activity. This commenter stated that under Title IX an individual may not be ''excluded'' from a federally-assisted program or activity on the basis of sex, and asked whether recipients must address sexual harassment that did not occur ''in'' its education program or activity but nevertheless effectively excluded the victim from equal access to it.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the questions raised by commenters regarding the application of ''education program or activity'' in § 106.44(a) of the final regulations. The final regulations do not impose requirements on a recipient's code of conduct processes addressing misconduct occurring outside the recipient's education program or activity, and do not govern the recipient's decisions to address or not address such misconduct. The Department's regulatory authority is limited to the scope of Title IX: Ensuring that recipients of Federal funding operate education programs or activities free from sex discrimination. For the final regulations to apply, sexual harassment (a form of sex discrimination) must occur in the recipient's education program or activity. As explained previously, nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient from offering supportive measures to a complainant who reports sexual harassment that occurred outside the recipient's education program or activity, and any sexual harassment or sex discrimination that does occur in an education program or activity must be responded to even if it relates to, or happens subsequent to, sexual harassment that occurred outside the education program or activity.

Whether sexual harassment occurs in a recipient's education program or activity is a fact-specific inquiry. The key questions are whether the recipient exercised substantial control over the respondent and the context in which the incident occurred. There is no bright-policy, statutory classification that neither proceeds along suspect lines nor infringes fundamental constitutional rights must be upheld against equal protection challenge if there is any reasonably conceivable state of facts that could provide rational basis for classification).

[904] Cannon v. Univ. of Chicago, 441 U.S. 677, 704 (1979).

[905] In response to many commenters' concerns that § 106.45(b)(3) was understood to prevent recipients from addressing misconduct that occurred outside an education program or activity, the Department has revised § 106.45(b)(3)(i) in the final regulations to expressly state that mandatory dismissal due to the alleged conduct occurring outside an education program or activity is only a dismissal for purposes of Title IX and does not preclude the recipient from addressing the conduct through other codes of conduct.

line geographic test, and off-campus sexual misconduct is not categorically excluded from Title IX protection under the final regulations.[906] Recognizing that recipients need to carefully consider this matter, the Department revised § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to require training for Title IX Coordinators, investigators, decision-makers, and persons who facilitate informal resolution processes on ''the scope of the recipient's education program or activity.''

In response to a commenter's question regarding the NPRM's use of the terms ''in,'' ''within,'' and ''under'' an education program or activity, and whether those terms are intended to have different meanings, the Department has replaced ''within'' with ''in'' throughout the final regulations, thus making all provisions consistent with the reference to ''in'' contained in § 106.44(a). We also wish to clarify that the final regulations' use of the term ''in'' is meant to be interchangeable with the Title IX statute's use of ''under''; the Department gives the same meaning to these prepositions, and notes that the Supreme Court in Davis referenced harassment ''under'' the operations of (i.e., the program or activity of) a recipient and harassment that occurred ''in'' a context subject to the recipient's control seemingly interchangeably.[907]

Changes: The final regulations consistently use ''in'' an education program or activity rather than ''within.''

Section 106.44(a) ''Against a Person in the U.S.''

Impact on Study Abroad Participants

Comments: Several commenters asserted that the NPRM would endanger students studying abroad, because the final regulations apply only to sexual harassment that occurs against a person in the United States. Commenters argued that when recipients offer students study abroad opportunities, recipients should still have responsibility to ensure student safety and well-being. Commenters acknowledged that Congress may not have contemplated studying abroad or recipients having satellite campuses across the globe when drafting Title IX in the 1970s. However, commenters argued that international experiences are increasingly common and critical components of education today, particularly in higher education, and that some schools require students in certain academic programs to study abroad. Commenters noted that even the Federal government, on the U.S. State Department website, encourages students to have international exposure to compete in a globalized society. Commenters argued that it would be absurd for the Federal government to encourage international exposure for students and not protect them in the process because studying abroad is necessary for some majors and to prepare for certain careers. Commenters cited studies suggesting study abroad increases the risk for sexual misconduct against female students and showing how students had to alter their career paths in the aftermath of sexual misconduct experienced abroad.[908] One commenter stated that harassment abroad, such as by institution-employed chaperones, can derail victims' ability to complete their education at their home institution in the United States. This commenter stated that for the Department to interpret Title IX as providing no recourse for such students is impossible to imagine. Commenters asserted that the NPRM tells bad actors they can get away with sexual misconduct in foreign programs. Commenters asserted that study abroad students are already uniquely vulnerable and less likely to report to foreign local authorities because, for example, they may be unfamiliar with the foreign legal system, they share housing with the perpetrators, and there may be language barriers, fear of retaliation or social isolation, and fewer available support services. Commenters further argued that because crime occurring overseas cannot be prosecuted in the U.S, filing a Title IX report with the recipient might be the survivor's only option. Commenters contended that the NPRM may have the effect of discouraging students from studying abroad and learning about foreign cultures and languages which would run contrary to the fundamental purpose of education to foster curiosity and discovery.

Discussion: We acknowledge the concerns raised by many commenters that the final regulations would not extend Title IX protections to incidents of sexual misconduct occurring against persons outside the United States, and the impact that this jurisdictional limitation might have on the safety of students participating in study abroad programs. However, by its plain text, the Title IX statute does not have extraterritorial application. Indeed, Title IX states that ''[n]o person in the United States shall, on the basis of sex be excluded from participation in, be denied the benefits of, or be subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance[.]'' [909] The Department believes a plain meaning interpretation of a statute is most consistent with fundamental rule of law principles, ensures predictability, and gives effect to the intent of Congress. Courts have recognized a canon of statutory construction that ''Congress ordinarily intends its statutes to have domestic, not extraterritorial, application.'' [910] This canon rests on presumptions that Congress is mainly concerned with domestic conditions and seeks to avoid unintended conflicts between our laws and the laws of other nations.[911] If Congress intended Title IX to have extraterritorial application, then it could have made that intention explicit in the text when it was passed in 1972, and Congress could amend Title IX to apply to a recipient's education programs or activities located outside the United States if Congress so chooses. The Federal government's encouragement of international experiences, such as study abroad, is not determinative of Title IX's intended scope. The U.S. Supreme Court most recently acknowledged the presumption against extraterritoriality in Kiobel v. Royal Dutch Petroleum [912] and Morrison v. National Australian Bank.[913] In Morrison, the Court reiterated the ''longstanding principle of American law that legislation of Congress, unless a contrary intent appears, is meant to apply only within the territorial jurisdiction of the United States.'' [914] The Court concluded that ''[w]hen a statute gives no clear indication of extraterritorial application, it has none.'' [915]

Very few Federal cases have addressed whether Title IX applies extraterritorially to allegations of sex discrimination occurring abroad, and Federal district courts have reached different results in these cases.[916] To date, no Federal circuit has addressed this issue. Commenters noted that the court in King v. Board of Control of Eastern Michigan University [917] applied Title IX to a claim of sexual harassment occurring overseas during a study abroad program; the Federal district court reasoned that study abroad programs are educational operations of the recipient that ''are explicitly covered by Title IX and which necessarily require students to leave U.S. territory in order to pursue their education.'' The court emphasized that Title IX's scope extends to ''any education program or activity'' of a recipient, which presumably would include the recipient's study abroad programs. While the Department agrees that a recipient's study abroad programs may constitute education programs or activities of the recipient, the Department agrees with the rationale applied by a Federal district court in Phillips v. St. George's University [918] that regardless of whether a study abroad program is part of a recipient's education program or activity, Title IX does not have extraterritorial application. The court in Phillips noted that nothing in the Title IX statute's plain language indicates that Congress intended it to apply outside the U.S. and that the plain meaning of ''person in the United States'' suggests that Title IX only applies to persons located in the United States, even when that person is participating in a recipient's education program or activity outside the United States.

Both Phillips and King were decided before the Supreme Court's Morrison and Kiobel opinions, and the Department doubts that the rationale applied by the court in King would survive analysis under those Supreme Court decisions, which emphasized the importance of the presumption against extraterritoriality of statutes passed by Congress. We find the Phillips Court's reasoning to be well-founded, especially in light of the later-decided Supreme Court cases regarding extraterritoriality, and we believe the jurisdictional limitation on extraterritoriality contained in the final regulations is wholly consistent with the text of the Title IX statute and with the presumption against extraterritoriality recognized numerous times by the Supreme Court. We further note that the Supreme Court acknowledges that where Congress intends for its statutes to apply outside the United States, Congress knows how to codify that intent.[919] When Congress has codified such intent in other Federal civil rights laws, Congress has addressed issues that arise with extraterritorial application such as potential conflicts with foreign laws and procedures.[920] Based on the presumption against extraterritoriality reinforced by Supreme Court decisions and the plain language in the Title IX statute limiting protections to persons ''in the United States,'' the Department believes that the Department does not have authority to declare that the presumption against extraterritoriality has been overcome, absent further congressional or Supreme Court direction on this issue.

As a practical matter, we also note that schools may face difficulties interviewing witnesses and gathering evidence in foreign locations where sexual misconduct may have occurred. Recipients may not be in the best position to effectively investigate alleged sexual misconduct in other countries. Such practical considerations weigh in favor of the Department looking to Congress to expressly state whether Congress intends for Title IX to apply in foreign locations.

We emphasize that nothing in these final regulations prevents recipients from initiating a student conduct proceeding or offering supportive measures to address sexual misconduct against a person outside the United States. We have revised § 106.45(b)(3) to explicitly state that even if a recipient must dismiss a formal complaint for Title IX purposes because the alleged sexual harassment did not occur against a person in the U.S., such a dismissal is only for purposes of Title IX, and nothing precludes the recipient from addressing the alleged misconduct through the recipient's own code of conduct. Contrary to claims made by some commenters, it is not true that the final regulations leave students studying abroad with no recourse in the event of sexual harassment or sexual assault. Recipients remain free to adopt disciplinary systems to address sexual misconduct committed outside the United States, to protect their students from such harm, and to offer supportive measures such as mental health counseling or academic adjustments for students impacted by misconduct committed abroad. As such, we believe the final regulations will not discourage students from participating in study abroad programs that may enrich their educational experience.

Consistency With Federal Law and Departmental Practice

Comments: Some commenters asserted that excluding extraterritorial application of Title IX would conflict with other Federal laws and past practice of the Department. One commenter stated that the NPRM is inconsistent with the Department's own interpretation of the VAWA amendments to the Clery Act, and argued that carving out conduct occurring abroad conflicts with Clery Act language regarding geographical jurisdiction. This commenter argued that if a postsecondary institution has a separate campus abroad or owns or controls a building or property abroad that is used for educational purposes and used by students, the postsecondary institution must disclose the Clery Act crimes that occur there. The commenter suggested it would be illogical to require recipients to make such disclosures and yet not address the same underlying misconduct and that this puts recipients in a precarious position. Other commenters argued that the Department should interpret Title IX as protecting persons enrolled in education programs or activities the recipient conducts or sponsors abroad, as this interpretation would be consistent with application of other Federal civil rights laws, such as Title VI, and that the proposed rules' approach conflicts with the Department's past approach of requiring recipients to address sexual misconduct that could limit participation in education programs or activities overseas.

Discussion: We disagree with the commenters who contended that excluding application of Title IX to sexual misconduct committed outside the United States raises untenable conflict with the past practice of the Department and other Federal laws.

With respect to past practice of the Department, OCR has never explicitly addressed in any of its guidance whether Title IX has extraterritorial application. For example, though the withdrawn 2014 Q&A stated that ''[u]nder Title IX, a school must process all complaints of sexual violence, regardless of where the conduct occurred, to determine whether the conduct occurred in the context of an education program or activity,'' [921] it included an illustrative list of covered ''[o]ff-campus education programs and activities'' such as activities occurring at fraternity or sorority houses and school-sponsored field trips; none of these examples involved an education program or activity outside the United States.[922] However, to the extent that application of the ''person in the United States'' language in the final regulations departs from past Department guidance or practice, the Department believes that the jurisdictional limitation on extraterritoriality contained in the final regulations is reasonable and wholly consistent with the plain text of the Title IX statute and with the presumption against extraterritoriality recognized numerous times by the U.S. Supreme Court.

With respect to other Federal law, we acknowledge that certain misconduct committed overseas is reportable under the Clery Act where, for example, the misconduct occurs in a foreign location that a U.S. institution owns and controls. However, the two laws (Title IX and the Clery Act) do not have the same scope or purpose,[923] even though the two laws often intersect for postsecondary institution recipients who are also subject to the Clery Act. The Department does not perceive a conflict between a recipient's obligation to comply with reporting obligations under the Clery Act and response obligations under Title IX. As discussed above, both the text of the Title IX statute and case law on the topic of extraterritoriality make it clear that Title IX does not apply to sex discrimination against a person outside the United States.

With respect to Title VI, this statute, like Title IX, expressly limits its application to domestic discrimination with its opening words ''No person in the United States . . .'' and commenters provided no example of a Federal court or Department application of Title VI to conduct occurring outside the United States. Nonetheless, the final regulations are focused on administrative enforcement of Title IX, and for reasons discussed previously, the Department does not believe that the statutory text or judicial interpretations of Title IX overcome the presumption against extraterritoriality that applies to statutes passed by Congress.

Changes: None.

Constitutional Equal Protection

Comments: One commenter asserted that excluding extraterritorial application of Title IX may raise Constitutional issues under the Fourteenth Amendment Equal Protection Clause. This commenter argued that experiencing sexual victimization in study abroad programs detrimentally affects the student-survivor's education, and the Fourteenth Amendment guarantees these students equal protection, yet the NPRM would leave these students outside the scope of Title IX protection and deprive them of equal protection.

Discussion: We disagree with the contention that excluding extraterritorial application of Title IX may violate the Fourteenth Amendment Equal Protection Clause. As an initial matter, the applicable level of scrutiny under the Equal Protection Clause to any differential treatment of students under the § 106.44(a) ''against a person in the United States'' limitation would be the rational basis test. A heightened level of scrutiny would apply where a suspect or quasi-suspect classification is involved, such as race or sex. But, as here, where no such suspect or quasi-suspect classification is involved and the final regulations may treat students differently due to the geographic location of misconduct occurring outside the United States, the rational basis test applies. Under the rational basis test, a law or governmental action is valid under the Equal Protection Clause so long as it is rationally related to a legitimate government interest.[924] With respect to Title IX, Congress made a rational determination that recipients should only be held liable for misconduct that occurs within the United States. The statute's explicit reference to ''[n]o person in the United States'' in 20 U.S.C. 1681(a) reflects this jurisdictional limitation. To hold recipient responsible for misconduct that took place outside the country could be unrealistically demanding and lead to open-ended liability, and if Congress intended that result, then Congress could have expressly stated its intent for Title IX to apply overseas when enacting Title IX, and can amend Title IX to so state. The Department believes that the reference to ''against a person in the United States,'' in § 106.44(a), appropriately reflects both the plain meaning of the statutory text and congressional intent that Title IX is focused on eradicating sex discrimination in domestic education programs or activities. The Department reiterates that recipients remain free under the final regulations to use their own disciplinary codes to address sexual harassment committed abroad and to extend supportive measures to students affected by sexual misconduct outside the United States.

Changes: None.

Impact on International or Foreign Exchange Students in the U.S.

Comments: A few commenters asserted the proposed rules' limitation with respect to persons ''in the United States'' may be detrimental to survivors who are international students whose visa status depends on academic performance. One commenter expressed concern that § 106.44(a) would exclude foreign exchange students in the U.S. from Title IX coverage, arguing that the Department should not treat foreign exchange students as undeserving of the same protection as students born in the United States.

Discussion: The jurisdictional limitation that sexual harassment occurred against ''a person in the United States'' is not a limitation that protects only U.S. citizens; international students or foreign students studying in the United States are entitled to the same protections under Title IX as any other individuals. Title IX states that ''[n]o person in the United States'' shall be subject to discrimination based on sex. It is well-settled that the word ''person'' in this context includes citizens and non-citizens alike. Title IX protects every individual in the U.S. against discrimination on the basis of sex in education programs or activities receiving Federal financial assistance, regardless of citizenship or legal residency.

Section 106.44(a) Deliberate Indifference Standard

Comments: Many commenters were supportive of the deliberate indifference standard and several argued that it is a sufficient standard to hold institutions accountable for failing to address allegations of sexual misconduct in an appropriate manner. Many commenters favored the deliberate indifference standard because it affords institutions greater discretion to handle Title IX cases in a manner that is most consistent with the institution's educational mission and level of resources.

In contrast, other commenters advocated for the Department to return to the ''reasonableness'' standard because it affords recipients less discretion in their handling of Title IX complaints. These commenters argued that the reasonableness standard strikes the necessary balance between forcing schools to make certain policy changes, such as adopting due process protections in their grievance procedures, and granting deference. Other commenters argued that because the deliberate indifference standard is couched in terms of a safe harbor and coupled with ''highly prescriptive mechanism[s]'' under § 106.44 and § 106.45 it actually provides recipients with very little to no discretion in practice.

Many commenters expressed the general concern that lowering the ''reasonableness'' standard to the ''deliberate indifference'' standard allows schools to investigate fewer allegations, punish fewer bad actors, and would shield schools from administrative accountability even in cases where schools mishandle complaints, fail to provide effective support, and wrongly determine against the weight of the evidence that the accused was not responsible for the misconduct. One commenter compared the deliberate indifference standard in the proposed rules to the application of the deliberate indifference standard in the prison context under the Eighth Amendment,[925] arguing that if finalized the deliberate indifference standard would apply more stringently in the Title IX context and provide greater institutional protection to schools because it would be difficult to imagine any scenario where an institution could be found deliberately indifferent.

Some commenters argued that the deliberate indifference standard is only appropriate in actions for private remedies rather than public remedies, and asserted that the 2001 Guidance acknowledged this difference. Some commenters contended that the deliberate indifference standard is wholly inappropriate in the context of administrative enforcement, arguing that because the Department only demands equitable remedies of schools, in the form of policy changes, schools do not require the additional protection afforded by the deliberate indifference standard that applies in private lawsuits for money damages against schools. Other commenters noted that the deliberate indifference standard has not been adopted in the context of any of the other civil rights statutes OCR is charged with enforcing.

Various commenters indicated that more clarity is needed with respect to what the deliberate indifference standard requires of recipients in the absence of a formal complaint of sexual harassment. Some commenters requested that the Department include a definition for deliberate indifference. Many commenters critiqued the language used to convey the standard, expressing the concern that a school's response could be indifferent or unreasonable and not be in violation of Title IX so long as they were not deliberately indifferent or clearly unreasonable. Some commenters expressed the concern that the word ''deliberate'' implies an intentionality element, asserting that intent is difficult to prove. Other commenters believed the standard was too vaguely worded, provided too much deference to the institutions, and would always be interpreted in favor of the schools. Some commenters argued that the deliberate indifference standard would effectively deny the complainant any meaningful process because an institution could dismiss a complaint after determining that the alleged conduct does not fall within its interpretation of the sexual harassment definition.

Some suggested the Department revise the proposed rules to impose a different standard on schools in circumstances where the schools are responding to allegations against someone in a position of authority, pointing to the misconduct of Larry Nassar at Michigan State University.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the commenters' support of the deliberate indifference standard and agrees that the deliberate indifference standard affords recipients an appropriate amount of discretion to address sexual misconduct in our Nation's schools while holding recipients accountable if their response is clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances. The Department, however, also recognizes that too much discretion can result in unintended confusion and uncertainty for both complainants who deserve a meaningful response and careful consideration of their reports, and for respondents who should be punished only after they are determined to be responsible through a fair process. Since the implementing regulations were first issued in 1975, the Department has observed, and many stakeholders, including complainants and respondents, have informed the Department through public comment, that complainants and respondents have experienced various pitfalls and implementation problems from a lack of clarity with respect to recipients' obligations under Title IX. As stated in the proposed regulations, the lack of clear regulatory standards has contributed to processes that have not been fair to the parties involved, have lacked appropriate procedural protections, and have undermined confidence in the reliability of the outcomes of investigations of sexual harassment complaints. For the reasons stated in the ''Adoption and Adaption of the Supreme Court's Framework to Address Sexual Harassment'' section of this preamble, the Department will maintain the deliberate indifference standard in the final regulations, with revisions to § 106.44(a) that specify certain actions a recipient must take in order to not be deliberately indifferent.

In response to commenters' concerns that the deliberate indifference standard leaves recipients too much leeway to decide on an appropriate response, the Department revises § 106.44(a) to include specific actions that a recipient must take as part of its non-deliberately indifferent response. Section 106.44(a) requires that a recipient's response treat complainants and respondents equitably by offering supportive measures as defined in § 106.30 to a complainant, and by following a grievance process that complies with § 106.45 before the imposition of any disciplinary sanctions or other actions that are not supportive measures as defined in § 106.30, against a respondent.[926] As commenters have stated, many complainants would like supportive measures and do not necessarily wish to pursue a formal complaint and grievance process, although they should be informed of the process for filing a formal complaint. The Department wishes to respect the autonomy and wishes of a complainant throughout these final regulations, and recipients should also respect a complainant's wishes to the degree possible. Respondents also should not be punished for allegations of sexual harassment until after a grievance process that complies with § 106.45, as such a grievance process provides notice of the allegations to both complainants and respondents as well as a meaningful opportunity for both complainants and respondents to be heard. Additionally, the Title IX Coordinator must promptly contact the complainant to discuss the availability of supportive measures as defined in § 106.30, consider the complainant's wishes with respect to supportive measures, inform the complainant of the availability of supportive measures with or without the filing of a formal complaint, and explain to the complainant the process for filing a formal complaint. A recipient should engage in a meaningful dialogue with the complainant to determine which supportive measures may restore or preserve equal access to the recipient's education program or activity without unreasonably burdening the other party, including measures designed to protect the safety of all parties or the recipient's educational environment, or deter sexual harassment. A recipient must offer each complainant supportive measures, and a recipient will have sufficiently fulfilled its obligation to offer supportive measures as long as the offer is not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances, and so long as the Title IX Coordinator has contacted the complainant to engage in the interactive process also described in revised § 106.44(a). The Department acknowledges that there may be specific instances in which it is impossible or impractical to provide supportive measures. For example, the recipient may have received an anonymous report or a report from a third party and cannot reasonably determine the identity of the complainant to promptly contact the complainant. Similarly, if a complainant refuses the supportive measures that a recipient offers (and the supportive measures offered are not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances) and instead insists that the recipient take punitive action against the respondent without a formal complaint and grievance process under § 106.45, the Department will not deem the recipient's response to be clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances. If a recipient does not provide a complainant with supportive measures, then the recipient must document the reasons why such a response is not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances, pursuant to revised § 106.45(b)(10)(ii). Offering supportive measures to every complainant and documenting why not providing supportive measures is not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances are some of the actions required under these final regulations but not expressly required under case law describing the deliberate indifference standard. These actions are required as part of the Department's administrative enforcement of the deliberate indifference standard.

[926] For discussion of what is intended by refraining from imposing disciplinary sanctions and other actions that are ''not supportive measures'' against a respondent, see the ''Supportive Measures'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble. We use the same language to describe refraining from punishing a respondent with following the § 106.45 grievance process, in § 106.45(b)(1)(i).

Although we acknowledge the concerns of commenters urging the Department to abandon the deliberate indifference standard and return to the reasonableness standard, the Department disagrees for various reasons. As more fully explained in the ''Deliberate Indifference'' subsection of the ''Adoption and Adaption of the Supreme Court's Framework to Address Sexual Harassment'' section, the Department departs from its prior guidance that set forth a standard more like reasonableness, or even strict liability, instead of deliberate indifference. The Department's past guidance and enforcement practices have taken the position that a recipient's response to sexual harassment should be judged under a standard that expected the recipient's response to effectively stop harassment and prevent its recurrence.[927] This approach did not provide recipients adequate flexibility to make decisions affecting their students. For example, the Department's guidance required recipients to always investigate any report of sexual harassment, even when the complainant only wanted supportive measures and did not want an investigation.[928] Such a rigid requirement to investigate every report of sexual harassment in every circumstance intrudes into complainants' privacy without concern for complainants' autonomy and wishes and, thus, may chill reporting of sexual harassment. Additionally, the Department's past guidance did not distinguish between an investigation that leads to the imposition of discipline and an inquiry to learn more about a report of sexual harassment.[929] Deliberate indifference provides appropriate flexibility for recipients while holding recipients accountable for meaningful responses to sexual harassment that prioritize complainants' wishes.[930]

The Department disagrees that these final regulations are highly or overly prescriptive such that recipients have no discretion. Recipients retain discretion to determine which supportive measures to offer and must document why providing supportive measures is not clearly unreasonably in light of the known circumstances, if the recipient does not provide any supportive measures. The Department will not second guess the supportive measures that a recipient offers as long as these supportive measures are not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances. Similarly, the Department believes that the grievance process prescribed by § 106.45 creates a standardized framework for resolving formal complaints of sexual harassment under Title IX while leaving recipients discretion to adopt rules and practices not required under § 106.45.[931] The Department notes that these final regulations do not include the safe harbor provisions proposed in the NPRM, and the Department explains its decision for not including these safe harbors in the ''Recipient's Response in Specific Circumstances'' section of this preamble.

Contrary to some commenters' concerns, the deliberate indifference standard does not relieve recipients of their obligation to respond to every known allegation of sexual harassment. The deliberate indifference standard would also not allow recipients to investigate fewer allegations of sexual harassment or punish fewer respondents after a finding of responsibility. Rather, under these final regulations, recipients are specifically required to investigate allegations in a formal complaint (and must explain to each complainant the option of filing a formal complaint), and must provide a complainant with

[928] 2001 Guidance at 13, 15, 18; 2011 Dear Colleague Letter at 4.

[929] 2001 Guidance at 13, 15, 18; 2011 Dear Colleague Letter at 4.

[930] The final regulations specify that a recipient's non-deliberately indifferent response must include investigating and adjudicating sexual harassment allegations, when a formal complaint is filed by a complainant or signed by the recipient's Title IX Coordinator. § 106.44(b)(1); § 106.30 (defining ''formal complaint''); § 106.45(b)(3)(i).

[931] The revised introductory sentence in § 106.45(b) provides that any provisions, rules, or practices other than those required by this section that a recipient adopts as part of its grievance process for handling formal complaints of sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, must apply equally to both parties. The final regulations grant flexibility to recipients in other respects; see the discussion in the ''Other Language/Terminology Comments'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble (noting that recipients may decide whether to calculate time frames using calendar days, school days, or other method); § 106.45(b)(6)(i) (allowing, but not requiring, live hearings to be held virtually through use of technology); § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) (removing the requirement that evidence gathered in the investigation be provided to the parties using a file-sharing platform); §§ 106.45(b)(1)(vii), 106.45(b)(7)(i) (giving recipients a choice between using the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard).

remedies any time a respondent is found responsible for sexual harassment pursuant to § 106.45(b)(1)(i). Even where a formal investigation is not required (because neither the complainant nor the Title IX Coordinator has filed or signed a formal complaint, or because a complainant is not participating in or attempting to participate in the recipient's education program or activity at the time of filing), the deliberate indifference standard requires that a recipient's response is not clearly unreasonable in light of known circumstances. Contrary to commenters' arguments, this standard requires more than for a recipient to respond in some minimal or ineffective way because minimal and ineffective responses would inevitably qualify as ''clearly unreasonable'' and because as revised, § 106.44(a) imposes specific, mandatory obligations on a recipient with respect to a recipient's response to each complainant. Given that the deliberate indifference standard involves an analysis of whether a response was clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances, there are many different factual circumstances under which a recipient's response may be deemed deliberately indifferent.

Section 106.44(a) requires a recipient to respond promptly where the recipient has actual knowledge of sexual harassment; a recipient may have actual knowledge of sexual harassment even where no person has reported or filed a formal complaint about the sexual harassment. For example, employees in an elementary or secondary school may observe sexualized insults scrawled on school hallways, and even where no student has reported the incident, the school employees' notice of conduct that could constitute sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30 (i.e., unwelcome conduct that a reasonable person would conclude is so severe, pervasive, and objectively offensive that it effectively denies a person equal access to education) charges the recipient with actual knowledge, and the recipient must respond in a manner that is not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances, which could include the recipient removing the sexually harassing insults and communicating to the student body that sexual harassment is unacceptable. By way of further example, if a Title IX Coordinator were to receive multiple reports of sexual harassment against the same respondent, as part of a non-deliberately indifferent response the Title IX Coordinator may sign a formal complaint to initiate a grievance process against the respondent, even where no person who alleges to be the victim wishes to file a formal complaint. The deliberate indifference standard does not permit recipients to ignore or respond inadequately to sexual harassment of which the recipient has become aware, but the deliberate indifference standard appropriately recognizes that a recipient's prompt response will differ based on the unique factual circumstances presented in each instance of sexual harassment.

In response to comments that the Gebser/Davis liability standard (i.e., deliberate indifference) is and should be used only for monetary damages in private litigation, the Department notes that courts have used the Gebser/Davis standard in considering and awarding injunctive relief.[932] Additionally, in Gebser, the Supreme Court acknowledged that the Department of Education has the authority to ''promulgate and enforce requirements that effectuate [Title IX's] non-discrimination mandate.'' [933] In promulgating these final regulations, the Department is choosing to do just that. The Department is not required to adopt identical standards for all civil rights laws under the Department's enforcement authority, and after carefully considering the rationale relied upon by the Supreme Court in the context of sexual harassment under Title IX, the Department adopts the deliberate indifference standard articulated by the Supreme Court, tailored for administrative enforcement of recipients' responses to sexual harassment. The Department believes it would be beneficial for recipients and students alike if the administrative standards governing recipients' responses to sexual harassment were aligned with the standards developed by the Supreme Court in private actions, while ensuring that through administrative enforcement the Department holds recipients accountable for taking specific actions that the Gebser/Davis framework does not require.[934]

The Department also believes that the language used to describe the deliberate indifference standard is sufficiently clear. The Department defines the standard according to the conventional understanding of the standard, that is, to be deliberately indifferent means to have acted in a way that is ''clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances'' consistent with the formulation of the deliberate indifference standard offered by the Supreme Court in Davis.[935] The Department appreciates the opportunity to clarify that the term ''deliberate'' as used in the standard does not require an element of subjective intent to harm, or bad faith, or similar mental state, on the part of a recipient's officials, administrators, or employees. Rather, the final regulations clearly state in § 106.44(a) that a recipient with actual knowledge of sexual harassment against a person in the United States occurring in its education program or activity must respond in a manner that is ''not clearly unreasonable,'' including by taking certain specific steps such as offering supportive measures to a complainant. Accordingly, the Department will hold a recipient responsible for compliance regardless of whether acting in a clearly unreasonable way, in light of the known circumstances, is the result of malice, incompetence, ignorance, or other mental state of the recipient's officials, administrators, or employees. As adapted for administrative enforcement, the deliberate indifference standard sufficiently ensures that a recipient takes steps to address student safety and provides equal access to the recipient's education program or activity while preserving a recipient's discretion to address the unique facts and circumstances presented by any particular situation (for example, a [932] Fitzgerald v. Barnstable Sch. Dist., 555 U.S. 246, 255 (2009) (''In addition, this Court has recognized an implied private right of action . . . recipient's offer of supportive measures as required in § 106.44(a) will be evaluated based on whether the recipient offered supportive measures to the complainant that, under the facts and circumstances presented in an individual complainant's situation, were in fact designed to restore or preserve the complainant's equal educational access).

The Department is persuaded by commenters' suggestions that the Department should impose stricter, more specific obligations on recipients' responses to sexual harassment or sexual harassment allegations, including allegations against employees in positions of authority. Rather than abandoning the deliberate indifference liability standard, the Department adapts that standard for administrative enforcement in ways that preserve the benefits of aligning judicial and administrative enforcement rubrics, preserve the benefit of the ''not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances'' standard's deference to unique factual circumstances, yet imposes mandatory obligations on every recipient to respond in specific ways to each complainant alleged to be victimized by sexual harassment. Adopting the Supreme Court's formulation of the deliberate indifference standard, while adapting that standard to specify what a recipient must do every time the recipient knows of sexual harassment (or allegations of sexual harassment), addresses commenters' concerns that the deliberate indifference standard as presented in the NPRM did not impose strict enough requirements on a recipient to ensure the recipient responds supportively and fairly to sexual harassment in its education programs or activities.

In the interest of providing greater clarity, consistency, and transparency as to a recipient's obligations under Title IX and what students can expect, the Department does not want to overcomplicate the regulatory scheme in the final regulations by establishing separate standards for when a recipient is handling complaints involving different classes of respondents (for example, allegations against students, versus allegations against employees). The Department believes that expecting a recipient to respond in a manner that is not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances appropriately requires a recipient to take into account whether the respondent holds a position of authority.

Changes: The Department revised § 106.44(a) to provide that a recipient's response must be prompt, and must treat complainants and respondents equitably by offering supportive measures as defined in § 106.30 to a complainant, and by following a grievance process that complies with § 106.45 before the imposition of any disciplinary sanctions or other actions that are not supportive measures as defined in § 106.30, against a respondent. Section § 106.44(a) is also revised to provide that the Title IX Coordinator must promptly contact the complainant to discuss the availability of supportive measures as defined in § 106.30, consider the complainant's wishes with respect to supportive measures, inform the complainant of the availability of supportive measures with or without the filing of a formal complaint, and explain to the complainant the process for filing a formal complaint.

Recipient's Response in Specific Circumstances

Section 106.44(b) Proposed ''Safe Harbors,'' Generally

Comments: Some commenters praised the safe harbor provisions generally for giving colleges and universities the discretion to respond to sexual harassment complaints outside the formal grievance process. Some commenters also praised the safe harbor provisions for identifying specific circumstances under which a recipient can conform its response to legal requirements and avoid a finding of deliberate indifference.

Some commenters, although supportive of the safe harbors generally, requested that the Department clarify how the safe harbors would work.

Many commenters disagreed with the Department's use of the term ''safe harbor'' in the NPRM, because the provisions that provided a ''safe harbor'' also include mandatory requirements. These commenters argued that a safe harbor is conventionally understood as a provision that a regulated party can take advantage of to shield itself from administrative action, as opposed to something a regulated party is required to do. Commenters asserted that ''safe harbors'' are options rather than obligations and pointed to the mandatory language contained in proposed § 106.44(b)(2) under which the Title IX Coordinator would have been required to file a formal complaint upon receiving multiple reports against a respondent,[936] as fundamentally inconsistent with the idea of a safe harbor.

Some commenters criticized the safe harbor provisions as rules intended to immunize recipients from a finding of deliberate indifference but requiring no more than a minimal response to allegations of sexual harassment, contrary to Title IX's express intent. Commenters argued that the safe harbor provisions, combined with the deliberate indifference standard, curtail the Department's ability to independently and comprehensively review a recipient's response to sexual harassment allegations, amounting to an abdication of the Department's role to enforce Title IX.

Discussion: The Department appreciates comments in support of the two proposed safe harbors. Upon further consideration, the Department decided not to include the two proposed safe harbors in these final regulations.

One of the proposed safe harbor provisions provided that if the recipient followed a grievance process (including implementing any appropriate remedy as required) that complies with § 106.45 in response to a formal complaint, the recipient's response to the formal complaint would not be deliberately indifferent and would not otherwise constitute discrimination under Title IX. The proposed provision was meant to provide an assurance that the recipient's response (only as to the formal complaint) would not be deemed deliberately indifferent as long as a recipient complies with § 106.45. This proposed safe harbor left open the possibility that other aspects of the recipient's response may be deliberately indifferent. The Department understands commenters' concerns that this safe harbor provision may have been confusing or misleading by somehow suggesting that compliance with § 106.45 is not required, or by suggesting that compliance with § 106.45 would have excused a recipient from providing a non-deliberately indifferent response with respect to matters other than conducting a grievance process. The Department is not including this proposed safe harbor provision in the final regulations to make it clear that recipients are always required to comply with § 106.45 in response to a formal complaint, and are always required to comply with all the obligations specified in § 106.44(a), with or without a formal complaint being filed. Indeed, the Department retains the mandate in § 106.45(b)(1) and revises this mandate for clarity to state: ''In response to a formal complaint, a recipient must follow a grievance process that complies with § 106.45.'' The Department did not intend to leave the impression that it was immunizing recipients with respect to their obligations to address sexual harassment. These final regulations require a meaningful response to allegations of sexual harassment of which a recipient has notice, when the sexual harassment occurs in a recipient's education program or activity against a person in the United States.

The second proposed safe harbor provided that a recipient would not be deliberately indifferent when in the absence of a formal complaint the recipient offers and implements supportive measures designed to effectively restore or preserve the complainant's access to the recipient's education program or activity, and the recipient also informs the complainant in writing of the right to file a formal complaint. This safe harbor is now unworkable and unnecessary in light of other revisions made to the proposed regulations, specifically a recipient's obligations in § 106.44(a) and § 106.45(b)(10)(ii). Under § 106.44(a), a recipient's response must treat complainants and respondents equitably by offering the complainant supportive measures as defined in § 106.30, and a Title IX Coordinator must promptly contact the complainant to discuss the availability of supportive measures, consider the complainant's wishes with respect to supportive measures, inform the complainant of the availability of supportive measures with or without the filing of a formal complaint, and explain to the complainant the process for filing a formal complaint. The Department revised § 106.45(b)(1) to add a mandate that with or without a formal complaint, a recipient must comply with § 106.44(a), emphasizing that recipients must offer supportive measures to a complainant regardless of whether a complainant chooses to file a formal complaint, and recipients must investigate any formal complaint that a complaint does choose to file. Additionally, under § 106.45(b)(10)(ii), if a recipient does not provide a complainant with supportive measures, then the recipient must document why such a response was not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances. As recipients are now required to offer supportive measures to a complainant (not only incentivized to do so by the proposed safe harbor) and to document why not providing a complainant with supportive measures was not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances, the final regulations removes safe harbors and instead, the Department will enforce the mandates and requirements in the final regulations, including those specified in §§ 106.44(a) and 106.44(b).

Despite the absence of these safe harbor provisions, recipients still have discretion with respect to how to respond to sexual harassment allegations in a way that takes into account factual circumstances. The final regulations, like the proposed regulations, require a recipient to begin the § 106.45 grievance process in response to a formal complaint. A recipient retains significant discretion under these final regulations, yet must meet specific, mandatory obligations that ensure a recipient responds supportively and fairly to every allegation of Title IX sexual harassment. For example, a recipient may decide which supportive measures to offer a complainant, whether to offer an informal resolution process under § 106.45(b)(9), whether to allow all parties, witnesses, and other participants to appear at the live hearing virtually under § 106.45(b)(6)(i), and whether to take action under another provision of the recipient's code of conduct even if the recipient must dismiss allegations in a formal complaint under § 106.45(b)(3)(i), among other areas of discretion.

These final regulations also provide sufficient clarity as to how a recipient must respond to sexual harassment, rendering the proposed safe harbors unnecessary. For example, § 106.44(a) specifically addresses how a recipient's response must treat complainants and respondents equitably by offering supportive measures as defined in § 106.30 to a complainant, and by following a grievance process that complies with § 106.45 before the imposition of any disciplinary sanctions or other actions that are not supportive measures against a respondent. Section § 106.44(b)(1) also clearly mandates that in response to a formal complaint a recipient must follow a grievance process that complies with § 106.45, and with or without a formal complaint, a recipient must comply with § 106.44(a). The Department clearly addresses specific circumstances throughout these final regulations. For example, the Department addresses when a recipient must or may dismiss a formal complaint under § 106.45(b)(3) for purposes of sexual harassment under Title IX or this part, when a recipient may consolidate formal complaints as to allegations of sexual harassment under § 106.45(b)(4), and when an informal resolution process may be offered under § 106.45(b)(9), among other matters.

The elimination of the safe harbor provisions proposed in the NPRM alleviates and addresses the concerns of commenters who opposed these safe harbor provisions.

Changes: The Department does not include the two safe harbor provisions from the NPRM, in proposed § 106.44(b)(1) and proposed § 106.44(b)(3).

Section 106.44(b)(1) Mandate To Investigate Formal Complaints and Safe Harbor

Comments: Several commenters supported § 106.44(b)(1), asserting that this provision places control in the hands of the victims, and prevents victims from having to participate in a grievance process against their will. Other commenters opposed this provision, arguing that it relieves institutions of the obligation to address sexual harassment claims of which they have actual knowledge by discouraging institutions from investigating allegations in the absence of a formal complaint.

Many commenters expressed concern that institutions will merely ''check'' the procedural ''boxes'' outlined in § 106.45 without regard for the substantive outcomes of formal grievance processes. Many commenters asserted that this proposed safe harbor would only benefits respondents, and would provide no benefit to complainants. Other commenters asserted that if a recipient fails to follow procedural requirements in § 106.45, the safe harbor in § 106.44(b)(1) would only hold recipients to the standard of deliberate indifference, which commenters argued was too low a standard to ensure that recipients comply with the § 106.45 grievance process.

Many commenters argued that the safe harbor in § 106.44(b)(1) provided too little flexibility for institutions to develop their own grievance process. Some commenters expressed concern that a recipient would not have the flexibility to forgo a grievance process in a situation where the recipient determined that the allegations contained in a formal complaint were without merit, frivolous, or that the allegations had already been investigated. Some commenters asked the Department to clarify whether satisfying § 106.45 is the only way, or one of many ways, to comply with the proposed rules and receive the safe harbor protections of § 106.44(b)(1).

Another commenter suggested that the Department add a timeliness requirement to § 106.44(b)(1) so that a formal complaint must be filed within a certain time frame, in order to avoid prejudice or bias against a respondent.

Discussion: As explained in the ''Section 106.44(b) Proposed 'Safe harbors,' generally,'' subsection of the ''Recipient's Response in Specific Circumstances'' section of this preamble, these final regulations do not include the safe harbor provision that if the recipient follows a grievance process (including implementing any appropriate remedy as required) that complies with § 106.45 in response to a formal complaint, the recipient's response to the formal complaint is not deliberately indifferent and does not otherwise constitute discrimination under Title IX. The Department understands commenters' concerns that this safe harbor provision may have been confusing or misleading by somehow suggesting that full compliance with § 106.45 is not required—that is, by suggesting that a recipient must only follow § 106.45 in a way that is not deliberately indifferent. The Department is not including this proposed safe harbor provision in the final regulations to make it clear that recipients are always required to fully comply with § 106.45 in response to a formal complaint. Indeed, the Department retains the mandate in § 106.45(b)(1) and revises this mandate for clarity to state: ''In response to a formal complaint, a recipient must follow a grievance process that complies with § 106.45.'' The Department also recognizes, as many commenters stated, that a complainant may not wish to initiate or participate in a grievance process for a variety of reasons, including fear of re-traumatization, and the Department affirms the autonomy of complainants by making it clear that a recipient must investigate and adjudicate when a complainant has filed a formal complaint. At the same time, the final regulations ensure that complainants must be offered supportive measures with or without filing a formal complaint, thus respecting the autonomy of complainants who do not wish to initiate or participate in a grievance process by ensuring that such complainants receive a supportive response from the recipient regardless of also choosing to file a formal complaint. For this reason, the Department revised § 106.44(b)(1) to expressly state: ''With or without a formal complaint, a recipient must comply with § 106.44(a).'' Section 106.44(a) requires a recipient to offer a complainant supportive measures as part of its prompt, non-deliberately indifferent response, whether or not the complainant chooses to file a formal complaint.

The Department disagrees that these final regulations discourage recipients from investigating allegations. As explained previously, a recipient must investigate a complainant's allegations when the complainant chooses to file a formal complaint, and a recipient may choose to initiate a grievance process to investigate the complainant's allegations even when the complainant chooses not to file a formal complaint, if the Title IX Coordinator signs a formal complaint, after having considered the complainant's wishes and evaluated whether an investigation is not clearly unreasonable in light of the specific circumstances. A recipient, however, cannot impose any disciplinary sanctions or other actions that are not supportive measures against a respondent until after the recipient follows a grievance process that complies with § 106.45. The recipient's Title IX Coordinator may always sign a formal complaint, as defined in § 106.30, to initiate an investigation. The formal complaint triggers the grievance process in § 106.45, which provides notice to both parties of the investigation and provides them an equal opportunity to participate and respond to the allegations of sexual harassment. These final regulations protect both complainants and respondents from the repercussions of an investigation that they do not know about and cannot participate in, and the complainant as well as the respondent may choose whether to participate in the grievance process.[937]

By eliminating § 106.44(b)(1), the Department makes it clear that recipients will not be able to merely ''check boxes'' or escape liability just for having a process that appears ''on paper'' to comply with § 106.45. We appreciate the opportunity to clarify that the Department will evaluate a recipient's compliance with § 106.45 without regard to whether the recipient was ''deliberately indifferent'' in failing to comply with those provisions. In other words, the Department may find that the recipient violated any of the requirements in § 106.45, whether or not the recipient believes that failure to comply was ''not clearly unreasonable.'' As explained throughout this preamble, including in the ''Role of Due Process in the Grievance Process'' section of this preamble, the Department has selected all the provisions of the § 106.45 grievance process as those provisions needed to improve the fairness, reliability, predictability, and legitimacy of Title IX grievance processes, and expects recipients to comply with the entirety of § 106.45. For example, the Department may find that a recipient violated § 106.45(b)(2) if the recipient did not provide the requisite written notice of allegations to both parties, even if the recipient believes that the recipient had a good reason for refusing to send that initial written notice. Similarly, a recipient may violate § 106.45(b)(5)(ii) if the recipient does not provide an equal opportunity for the parties to present witnesses, including fact and expert witnesses, and other inculpatory and exculpatory evidence as part of the investigation, even if the recipient believes that refusing to do so was not clearly unreasonable.

The Department disagrees that the grievance process prescribed by § 106.45 favors respondents or provides no benefits to complainants. For reasons explained throughout this preamble, including in the ''Role of Due Process in the Grievance Process'' section and the ''General Support and Opposition to the § 106.45 Grievance Process'' section of this preamble, the Department believes that the § 106.45 grievance process gives complainants and respondents clear, strong procedural rights and protections that foster a fair process leading to reliable outcomes. For example, a complainant whose allegations of sexual harassment in a formal complaint are dismissed may appeal such a dismissal on specific grounds under § 106.45(b)(8)(i). The grievance process in § 106.45 provides consistency, predictability, and transparency as to a recipient's obligations and what students can expect when a formal complaint is filed. As many commenters appreciated, under the final regulations, if the complainant decides to file a formal complaint, this will trigger a grievance process that includes the procedural safeguards set forth in § 106.45.

The Department understands commenters' arguments that § 106.44(b)(1) does not afford recipients flexibility to select a grievance process that the recipient prefers over the process prescribed in § 106.45. For reasons described in the ''Role of Due Process in the Grievance Process'' section of this preamble, and in the ''General Support and Opposition to the [937] Section 106.71 (added in the final regulations, prohibiting retaliation against any individual for exercising rights under Title IX, including an individual's right to participate, or to choose not to participate, in a Title IX grievance process). See the ''Retaliation'' section of this preamble for further discussion.

§ 106.45 Grievance Process'' section of this preamble, the Department believes that the grievance process prescribed by § 106.45 creates a standardized framework for resolving formal complaints of sexual harassment under Title IX while leaving recipients discretion to adopt rules and practices not required under § 106.45.[938] We reiterate that the § 106.45 grievance process applies only to formal complaints alleging sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, that occurred in the recipient's education program or activity against a person in the United States. These final regulations do not dictate what kind of process a recipient should or must use to resolve allegations of other types of misconduct. Because a recipient's response to Title IX sexual harassment is part of a recipient's obligation to protect every student's Federal civil right to participate in education programs and activities free from sex discrimination a recipient's response is not simply a matter of the recipient's own codes of conduct or policies; a recipient's response is a matter of fulfilling obligations under a Federal civil rights law. The Department has carefully crafted a standardized grievance process for resolving allegations of Title IX sexual harassment so that every student (and employee) receives the benefit of transparent, predictable, consistent resolution of formal complaints that allege sex discrimination in the form of sexual harassment under Title IX.

The Department acknowledges commenters' concerns that recipients do not have the discretion to forgo a formal grievance process in a situation where the recipient determined the allegations were without merit, frivolous, or had already been investigated, but we decline to grant that kind of discretion because the Department believes that, where a complainant chooses to file a formal complaint and initiate a recipient's formal grievance process, that formal complaint should be taken seriously and not prejudged or subjected to cursory or conclusory evaluation by a recipient's administrators. The purpose of the § 106.45 grievance process is to resolve allegations of sexual harassment impartially, without conflicts of interest or bias, and to objectively examine relevant evidence before reaching a determination regarding responsibility. Permitting a recipient to deem allegations meritless or frivolous without following the § 106.45 grievance process would defeat the Department's purpose in providing both parties with a consistent, transparent, fair process, would not increase the reliability of outcomes, and would increase the risk that victims of sexual harassment will not be provided remedies. The Department notes that the final regulations give recipients discretion to offer informal resolution processes to resolve formal complaints (§ 106.45(b)(9)) and permit discretionary dismissal of a formal complaint (or allegations therein) by a recipient under limited circumstances (§ 106.45(b)(3)(ii)).[939]

We have also considered commenters' suggestion that the Department add a requirement limiting the amount of time a complainant has for filing a formal complaint, but the Department declines to revise the final regulations to include a statute of limitations or similar time limit.[940] However, we have revised § 106.30 defining ''formal complaint'' to specify that at the time of filing a formal complaint, the complainant must be participating in or attempting to participate in the recipient's education program or activity. In addition, § 106.45(b)(3)(ii) allows a discretionary dismissal of a formal complaint where the complainant wishes to withdraw the formal complaint (if the complainant notifies the Title IX Coordinator, in writing, of this wish), where the respondent is no longer enrolled or employed by the recipient, or where specific circumstances prevent the recipient from meeting the recipient's burden of collecting evidence sufficient to reach a determination regarding responsibility. The length of time elapsed between an incident of alleged sexual harassment, and the filing of a formal complaint, may, in specific circumstances, prevent a recipient from collecting enough evidence to reach a determination, justifying a discretionary dismissal under § 106.45(b)(3)(ii).

Changes: The Department does not include the safe harbor provision regarding the § 106.45 grievance process that was proposed in § 106.44(b)(1) in the NPRM. Section 106.44(b)(1) in the final regulations retains the mandate to follow a grievance process that complies with § 106.45 in response to a formal complaint, and adds a mandate that the recipient must comply with § 106.44(a) with or without a formal complaint.

Proposed § 106.44(b)(2) Reports by Multiple Complainants of Conduct by Same Respondent [Removed in Final Regulations]

Comments: A number of commenters expressed opposition to proposed § 106.44(b)(2), which would have required Title IX Coordinators to file a formal complaint upon receiving reports from multiple complainants that a respondent engaged in conduct that could constitute sexual harassment. Commenters opposed this proposed provision due to concerns that the provision could place the safety of victims at risk by requiring a grievance process against a respondent over the wishes of the complainant and could place victims in harm's way without the victim's knowledge or input because nothing in the proposed provision required the Title IX Coordinator to first alert or warn the victim that the Title IX Coordinator would file a formal complaint. Commenters argued that this proposed provision implied that Title IX Coordinators could not file a formal complaint unless a respondent was a repeat offender.

A number of commenters expressed concern that the proposed provision would pose a particular risk in cases dealing with dating violence, domestic violence, or stalking. Commenters argued that survivors often choose not to report intimate partner violence or stalking to authorities for a multitude of reasons, one of which is fear that the perpetrator will retaliate or escalate the violence.

A number of commenters expressed concern that the mandatory filing requirement in proposed § 106.44(b)(2) would violate survivor autonomy. Commenters argued that the proposed provision would violate autonomy principles embedded elsewhere in the proposed rules. Commenters argued the [938] The revised introductory sentence in § 106.45(b) provides that any provisions, rules, or practices other than those required by § 106.45 that a recipient adopts as part of its grievance process for handling formal complaints of sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, must apply equally to both parties. The final regulations grant flexibility to recipients in other respects. The discussion in the ''Other Language/Terminology Comments'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble notes that recipients may decide whether to calculate time frames using calendar days, school days, or other method. See also § 106.45(b)(6)(i) (allowing, but not requiring, live hearings to be held virtually through use of technology); § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) (removing the requirement that evidence in the investigation be provided to the parties using a file-sharing platform); § 106.45(b)(7)(i) (giving recipients a choice between using the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard).

[939] See the ''Dismissal and Consolidation of Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble. We note that one of the bases for discretionary dismissal of a formal complaint (or allegations therein) is where specific circumstances prevent the recipient from gathering evidence sufficient to reach a determination. When a formal complaint contains allegations that are precisely the same as allegations the recipient has already investigated and adjudicated, that circumstance could justify the recipient exercising discretion to dismiss those allegations, under § 106.45(b)(3)(ii).

[940] For further discussion, see the ''Formal Complaint'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble.

Department's contradictory statements regarding the importance of survivor autonomy were arbitrary and capricious. Commenters argued that requiring schools to trigger formal grievance procedures when the school has received multiple reports of harassment by the same perpetrator would violate survivor autonomy and discourage reporting. One commenter asserted that the proposed provision would retraumatize victims by forcing an investigation when no victim wants to testify against the perpetrator. One commenter asserted that this provision would exacerbate survivors' feelings of powerlessness. Commenters asserted that students should be able to discuss a situation without the Title IX office initiating a formal process without the complainant's permission. Commenters stated that sometimes a student may want advice, or want supportive measures, without desiring a formal process.

A number of commenters expressed concern that requiring Title IX Coordinators to file formal complaints against the wishes of complainants will lead to violations of confidentiality of survivors who already do not want to come forward, and may not come forward at all if there is a risk that the school will violate their wishes by investigating. Commenters argued that victims who report but do not wish to pursue a formal complaint would be forced into potentially dangerous situations unknowingly, since nothing in the proposed rules imposed a duty on the institution to offer safety measures or accommodations. Other commenters asserted that litigation arising out of Title IX proceedings is common, and that requiring a recipient to pursue a grievance proceeding against a respondent invites the respondent to then name the complainant as a party to subsequent litigation even when the complainant did not want to initiate an investigation in the first place.

A number of commenters expressed concern that deeming the Title IX Coordinator as a complainant (by requiring them to file a formal complaint) creates a significant conflict of interest by placing the Title IX Coordinator in an adversarial position against the respondent. Other commenters argued that asking the Title IX Coordinator to sign and file a formal complaint in cases where complainants are unwilling to participate would make it impossible for the Title IX Coordinator to maintain the appearance of neutrality, even if they are in fact unbiased in all other ways. Other commenters expressed concern that if the person who reported the incident is reluctant to come forward, it would place the Title IX Coordinator, who should be an impartial resource, into a role of advocating for a specific person's report.

A number of commenters argued that the proposed provision would chill reporting of sexual harassment because victims would fear being drawn involuntarily into a formal process. Commenters suggested that, if institutions file formal complaints without the willing, informed participation of the victim, some requirements, including the cross-examination requirement, should be adjusted, to protect victims who did not consent to participate in a grievance process from negative consequences that commenters argued may possibly result from participating in a grievance process, especially a live hearing. Commenters argued that these consequences might include fear of re-traumatization from being cross-examined, questions perceived as invasions of privacy, and lawsuits filed by respondents based on testimony given during a Title IX hearing.

Commenters argued that this provision would depart from best practices for helping victims. Commenters asserted that in order to effectively address sex discrimination, educational institutions must be able to cultivate relationships of trust with community members with regard to reporting systems, and that this proposed provision would mean that recipients would violate the wishes of reporting parties, thereby betraying and violating their trust. Commenters asserted that the ability of a complainant to seek supportive measures without risking public exposure is foundational to creating conditions under which community members are more willing to avail themselves of institutional support, including formal grievance proceedings. Commenters expressed concern that, in the absence of supportive measures, many survivors cannot keep up with the demands of rigorous schoolwork while dealing with the impacts of trauma, and this proposed provision would leave complainants in a position of never knowing whether the complainant's report of sexual harassment would result in a formal process, because the complainant would have no way of knowing whether another complainant's report would trigger proposed § 106.44(b)(2).

Commenters expressed concern that proposed § 106.44(b)(2) would conflict with or be in tension with the requirement in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) that schools disregard statements provided by witnesses or parties who do not submit to cross-examination at a hearing, because if alleged victims are unwilling to participate in the process and be subject to cross-examination, then the adjudicator is not permitted to consider the complainant's statements, rendering the filing of a formal complaint by a Title IX Coordinator potentially futile. Commenters argued that there was a conflict between proposed § 106.44(b)(2) and the proposed requirement in § 106.45(b)(3) that a recipient must dismiss a complaint if the alleged harassment did not occur within the recipient's education program or activity; commenters questioned how the recipient should respond when multiple reports are made against the same respondent, but one or more of the reported incidents did not take place within the education program or activity of the school and suggested that to solve this conflict, recipients should make a good faith investigation into all reports of sexual harassment, regardless of the location of the incident, when one or more parties involved in the report are under the ''purview'' of the recipient.

A number of commenters argued that proposed § 106.44(b)(2) would not meet its stated goal of protecting students because the provision would not be limited only to stopping serial predators. Commenters argued that the proposed provision would incentivize schools to bring weak cases against serial perpetrators that may allow the predators to escape responsibility. Commenters expressed concern if schools are forced to move forward without the participation of complainants in every case where there are multiple reports of sexual harassment against the same respondent, then this may lead to dismissals or inaccurate findings of non-responsibility. Other commenters expressed concern that this proposed provision was designed to help recipients, not protect victims. Commenters argued the proposed provision was a designed-to-fail framework that would protect a recipient from a claim by another victim who is attacked by the same perpetrator, since all the recipient would be required to do is show that it made a pro forma attempt to comply with its obligations, to qualify for the safe harbor. Other commenters expressed concern that a recipient impermissibly motivated by sex stereotypes could exploit this proposed provision to engage in discriminatory practices that would otherwise constitute a violation of Title IX.

Commenters argued that this proposed provision could put a recipient in the untenable situation of being required to apply the formal grievance processes to a situation the recipient does not believe it can adequately investigate or that the recipient reasonably believes can be addressed through other appropriate means. A number of commenters expressed concern that this proposed provision would remove the Title IX Coordinator's discretion; commenters asserted that instead, Title IX Coordinators should evaluate what the appropriate response is, whether it be a formal investigation or putting the respondent on notice of the behavior complained about. Commenters argued that, consistent with the 2001 Guidance, recipients should continue to have discretion in determining whether or how to address multiple reports involving a single respondent in cases where complainants wish to remain anonymous or for other reasons are unwilling to participate in formal proceedings.

A number of commenters argued that proposed § 106.44(b)(2) would alter and harm the valuable function of the Title IX Coordinator. Other commenters expressed concern that this proposed provision would complicate the role of the Title IX Coordinator because if the Title IX Coordinator receives a report from a resident advisor or faculty member (rather than from the victim themselves), and then subsequently receives a report from a victim alleging a similar incident involving the same perpetrator, the Title IX Coordinator might be confused about whether or not the proposed provision requires the Title IX Coordinator to file a formal complaint.

One commenter asserted that proposed § 106.44(b)(2) would put schools at risk for liability for monetary damages in private Title IX lawsuits, as well as other State tort actions.

Commenters asserted that sometimes a third party reports an alleged sexual harassment situation, but the alleged victim insists that there was no violation and in cases like that, the recipient should be required to make a report that is not attached to either party's transcript, but that can be referenced if the alleged victim later wishes to file a formal complaint.

Discussion: Despite the intended benefits of proposed § 106.44(b)(2) described in the NPRM, the Department is persuaded by the many commenters who expressed a variety of concerns about requiring the Title IX Coordinator to file a formal complaint after receiving multiple reports about the same respondent. In addition to raising serious concerns about the potential effects on complainants, commenters also described practical problems with proposed § 106.44(b)(2) in relation to the rest of the final regulations. As a result, the Department is removing proposed § 106.44(b)(2) entirely.[941]

The Department is persuaded by commenters who argued that this proposed provision would have removed the Title IX Coordinator's discretion without necessary or sufficient reason to do so. The Department agrees that the Title IX Coordinator should have the flexibility to evaluate and determine an appropriate response under pertinent facts and circumstances. The Department agrees with commenters who argued that institutions should continue to have discretion in determining whether or how to address multiple reports involving a single respondent in cases where complainants wish to remain anonymous or otherwise are unwilling to participate in a formal process. Removing this proposed provision means that Title IX Coordinators retain discretion, but are not required, to sign formal complaints after receiving multiple reports of potential sexual harassment against the same respondent. We believe that this approach properly balances complainant autonomy, campus safety, and recipients' use of resources that would otherwise be required to be used to institute a potentially futile grievance process. The Department was persuaded by commenters' concerns that under the proposed rules, filing a formal complaint might have resulted in a Title IX Coordinator becoming a ''complainant'' during the grievance process, or creating a conflict of interest or lack of neutrality. We have revised the definitions of ''complainant'' and ''formal complaint'' in § 106.30 to clarify that when a Title IX Coordinator chooses to sign a formal complaint, that action is not taken ''on behalf of'' the complainant; the ''complainant'' is the person who is alleged to be the victim of conduct that could constitute sexual harassment. Those revisions further clarify that when a Title IX Coordinator signs a formal complaint, the Title IX Coordinator does not become a complainant or otherwise a party to the grievance process, and must abide by § 106.45(b)(1)(iii), which requires Title IX personnel to be free from conflicts of interest and bias, and serve impartially. We do not believe that signing a formal complaint that initiates a grievance process inherently creates a conflict of interest between the Title IX Coordinator and the respondent; in such a situation, the Title IX Coordinator is not advocating for or against the complainant or respondent, and is not subscribing to the truth of the allegations, but is rather instituting a grievance process (on behalf of the recipient, not on behalf of the complainant) based on reported sexual harassment so that the recipient may factually determine, through a fair and impartial grievance process, whether or not sexual harassment occurred in the recipient's education program or activity.

The Department is persuaded by commenters' concerns that the proposed provision would have created tension with § 106.45(b)(6)(i), which mandates that if a party or witness does not submit to cross-examination at the hearing, the decision-maker must not rely on any statement of that party or witness in reaching a determination regarding responsibility. The Department is persuaded by commenters' arguments that the proposed provision would have incentivized or forced recipients to file futile complaints against respondents with no complaining witness willing to testify at a live hearing. Whether or not proposed § 106.44(b)(2) would have conflicted with § 106.45(b)(3), the proposed provision § 106.44(b)(2) has been removed from the final regulations, and we have revised § 106.45(b)(3) to clarify that a recipient may choose to address allegations of sexual harassment that occurred outside the recipient's education program or activity, through non-Title IX codes of conduct. Where a complainant does not wish to participate in a grievance process, including being cross-examined at a live hearing, the recipient is not permitted to threaten, coerce, intimidate, or discriminate against the complainant in an attempt to secure the complainant's participation.[942] Thus, even if a Title IX Coordinator has signed a formal complaint, the complainant is not obligated to participate in the ensuing grievance process and need not appear at a live hearing or be cross-examined. We have added § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation and expressly protecting any person's right not to participate in a Title IX proceeding.

The Department is also persuaded that a chilling effect on victim reporting [941] The section number, 106.44(b)(2), now refers to the provision discussed in the ''Section 106.44(b)(2) OCR Will Not Re-weigh the Evidence'' subsection of the ''Recipient's Response in Specific Circumstances'' subsection of the ''Section 106.44 Recipient's Response to Sexual Harassment, Generally'' section of this preamble.

[942] Section 106.71(a).

can be avoided by eliminating this proposed provision. The Department is persuaded by commenters' concerns that complainants who are unwilling to file a formal complaint should be able to confidentially seek supportive measures without fear of being drawn into a formal complaint process whenever the Title IX Coordinator receives a second report from another complainant about the same respondent. The Department is persuaded by commenters' arguments that students should be able to discuss a situation with a Title IX Coordinator without the Title IX Coordinator being required to initiate a grievance process against the complainant's wishes, and by commenters' assertions that it is not uncommon for respondents filing private lawsuits against the recipient to include the complainant as a party to such lawsuits, so dragging a complainant into a grievance process against the complainant's wishes exposes the complainant to potential involvement in private litigation as well.

The Department appreciates commenters' suggestions for specific changes and clarifications to proposed § 106.44(b)(2); however, there is no need to consider such changes or clarifications because we are removing this proposed provision from the final regulations.

Changes: The Department has not included proposed § 106.44(b)(2) in the final regulations.

Comments: Some commenters expressed support for proposed § 106.44(b)(2), asserting that it would be valuable for the protection of sexual assault victims on university campuses. Other commenters argued that it is common sense for the Title IX Coordinator to be able to file complaints against bad actors. Some commenters argued that the provision would improve the responsiveness of university Title IX Coordinators to sexual assault or harassment allegations at institutions around the country. Other commenters supported this proposed provision so that Title IX Coordinators would file a complaint against repeat sexual offenders even when no victim was willing to file a formal complaint because this would protect a complainant's confidentiality.

Discussion: For the reasons discussed above, the Department is persuaded that eliminating proposed § 106.44(b)(2) better serves the Department's goals of ensuring that recipients respond adequately to reports of sexual harassment without infringing on complainant autonomy. Elimination of this proposed provision leaves Title IX Coordinators discretion to sign a formal complaint initiating a grievance process, when doing so is not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances, without mandating such a response every time multiple reports against a respondent are received. We note that contrary to some commenters' belief, the proposed provision would not have protected complainants' confidentiality by requiring Title IX Coordinators to file formal complaints, because the recipient would still have been required under § 106.45(b)(2) to send written notice of the allegations to both parties, and the written notice must include the complainant's identity, if known.

Changes: The Department has not included proposed § 106.44(b)(2) in the final regulations.

Comments: Some commenters suggested expanding or modifying proposed § 106.44(b)(2), for example by specifying factors to consider as to whether a pattern of behavior might present a potential threat to the recipient's community. Some commenters suggested specifying that a formal complaint must be filed where threats, serial predation, violence, or weapons were allegedly involved.

Commenters recommended adding a credibility threshold to proposed § 106.44(b)(2) specifying that a Title IX Coordinator would only be required to file a formal complaint upon receiving multiple credible reports against the same respondent, so that the Title IX Coordinator would not need to file a formal complaint where reports appeared frivolous or unfounded.

Commenters suggested that the Department adopt the model used by Harvard Law School for its Title IX compliance, which as described by commenters provides that (1) that there be a complainant willing to participate before the recipient will initiate a formal investigation and (2) the only time an action should be pursued without a willing complainant is if there is a serious risk to campus-wide safety and security. Several commenters suggested that, in instances where there are reports by multiple complainants but none are willing to participate in the proceedings, the Department could ensure accountability by requiring the recipient to document its reason for not initiating a formal complaint rather than requiring the recipient to file a formal complaint in every such situation.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' suggestions for specific changes to proposed § 106.44(b)(2); however, we decline to make such changes because we are removing this proposed provision from the final regulations for the reasons described above. The Department declines to adopt in these final regulations the suggestion that patterns of behavior be considered as a factor to determine whether possible future threats to the community warrant filing a formal complaint even where a complainant does not wish to file; however, as discussed above, elimination of proposed § 106.44(b)(2) leaves the Title IX Coordinator discretion to sign a formal complaint where doing so is not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances. The Title IX Coordinator may consider a variety of factors, including a pattern of alleged misconduct by a particular respondent, in deciding whether to sign a formal complaint. By giving the recipient's Title IX Coordinator the discretion to sign a formal complaint in light of the specific facts and circumstances, the Department believes it has reached the appropriate balance between campus safety, survivor autonomy, and respect for the most efficient use of recipients' resources. We also note that under the final regulations, including revised § 106.44(a), a Title IX Coordinator's decision to sign a formal complaint may occur only after the Title IX Coordinator has promptly contacted the complainant (i.e., the person alleged to have been victimized by sexual harassment) to discuss availability of supportive measures, consider the complainant's wishes with respect to supportive measures, and explain to the complainant the process for filing a formal complaint. Thus, the Title IX Coordinator's decision to sign a formal complaint includes taking into account the complainant's wishes regarding how the recipient should respond to the complainant's allegations.

The Department disagrees with the suggestion to expand the proposed provision to cover other circumstances such as alleged use of threats, violence, or weapons, because we are persuaded by commenters that leaving the Title IX Coordinator discretion to sign a formal complaint is preferable to mandating circumstances under which a Title IX Coordinator must sign a formal complaint. The final regulations give the Title IX Coordinator discretion to sign a formal complaint, and the Title IX Coordinator may take circumstances into account such as whether a complainant's allegations involved violence, use of weapons, or similar factors. The Department eliminated proposed § 106.44(b)(2) in part due to concerns expressed by commenters about survivor autonomy and safety; in some situations, the Title IX Coordinator may believe that signing a formal complaint is not in the best interest of the complainant and is not otherwise necessary for the recipient to respond in a non-deliberately indifferent manner. With the elimination of this provision, however, the Title IX Coordinator still possesses the discretion to sign formal complaints in situations involving threats, serial predation, violence, or weapons. Even in the absence of a formal complaint being filed, a recipient has authority under § 106.44(c) to order emergency removal of a respondent where the situation arising from sexual harassment allegations presents a risk to the physical health or safety of any person. Nothing in the final regulations prevents recipients, Title IX Coordinators, or complainants from contacting law enforcement to address imminent safety concerns.

Because the final regulations do not include this proposed provision, the Department does not further consider the commenter's suggestion to revise the eliminated provision by adding the word ''credible'' before ''reports.'' As discussed previously, the Department has removed this provision to respect complainant autonomy and avoid chilling reporting by mandating that a Title IX Coordinator sign a formal complaint over a complainant's wishes; the commenter's suggestion for modifying this proposed § 106.44(b)(2) would not change the Department's belief that the proposed provision should be removed in its entirety, because narrowing the circumstances under which the Title IX Coordinator would be required to sign a formal complaint over the complainant's wishes would not address the concerns raised by many commenters that persuaded the Department of the need to respect survivor autonomy by giving a Title IX Coordinator discretion (without making it mandatory) to sign a formal complaint. The Department further notes that one of the purposes of the § 106.45 grievance process is to ensure that determinations are reached only after objective evaluation of relevant evidence by impartial decision-makers, and therefore permitting or requiring a Title IX Coordinator to only respond to reports or formal complaints that the Title IX Coordinator deems ''credible'' would defeat the goal of following a grievance process to reach reliable outcomes. Similarly, the commenter's suggestion to require the recipient to document its reason for not initiating a formal complaint following reports by multiple complainants does not alter the Department's conclusion that the better way to respect survivor autonomy and the discretion of a Title IX Coordinator is to remove proposed § 106.44(b)(2) from the final regulations, so that a Title IX Coordinator retains the discretion to sign a formal complaint, but is not mandated to do so. We note that § 106.45(b)(10) does require a recipient to document the reasons for its conclusion that its response to any reported sexual harassment was not deliberately indifferent.

The Department declines to adopt the Harvard Law School model because we believe the final regulations provide the same or similar benefits with respect to requiring a grievance process only where a formal complaint has been filed by a complainant or signed by a Title IX Coordinator. For reasons discussed in the ''Formal Complaint'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble, third parties are not allowed to file formal complaints.

Changes: None.

Proposed § 106.44(b)(3) Supportive Measures Safe Harbor in Absence of a Formal Complaint [Removed in Final Regulations]

Comments: Many commenters appreciated that the proposed safe harbor regarding supportive measures would provide an incentive for institutions to offer supportive measures for both parties. Several commenters recounted personal stories of accused individuals being removed from classes and dorms before a determination had been made about pending allegations. Many commenters supported § 106.44(b)(2) for not requiring an individual to file a formal complaint in order to obtain supportive measures and for expressly including the requirement that, when offering supportive measures, recipients must notify a complainant of the right to file a formal complaint at a later date if they wish. Many commenters asserted that often, supportive measures are sufficient for both parties to deal with a situation without causing additional trauma to either party.

Some commenters expressed concern that the proposed safe harbor regarding supportive measures would effectively relieve institutions of the responsibility to hold respondents accountable and address sexual harassment on campuses. Many commenters argued that offering ''meager'' supportive measures to a student in lieu of investigating allegations would not satisfy a recipient's obligations under Title IX and asked the Department to clarify that the provision of supportive measures is not always adequate to satisfy the deliberate indifference standard.

Many commenters argued that the proposed safe harbor regarding supportive measures actually created a barrier to providing supportive measures for elementary and secondary school victims because the provision applied only to institutions of higher education, and asked the Department to modify the proposed rules to extend this supportive measures safe harbor to the elementary and secondary school context either by creating a separate safe harbor with nearly identical language or by deleting the phrase ''for institutions of higher education'' in the proposed regulatory text. One commenter asserted that § 106.44(b)(3) is redundant because it merely repeats the standard of § 106.44(a). One commenter argued that, when combined with the Department's proposed definition of sexual harassment, this proposed provision would create a safe harbor for educational institutions to avoid liability.

Other commenters suggested that the Department modify the proposed safe harbor regarding supportive measures to expressly prohibit institutions from coercing a complainant into accepting supportive measures in lieu of filing a formal complaint. At least one commenter suggested adding an outer time limit to a party's right to file a formal complaint ''at a later time,'' asserting that this proposed provision was inconsistent with the recordkeeping requirement in the proposed regulations, which would have allowed a record to be destroyed in three years (this retention period has been revised to seven years in § 106.45(b)(10) of the final regulations).

Discussion: As explained in the ''Section 106.44(b) Proposed 'Safe harbors,' generally,'' subsection of the ''Recipient's Response in Specific Circumstances'' section of this preamble, these final regulations do not include the safe harbor provision that a recipient is not deliberately indifferent when in the absence of a formal complaint the recipient offers and implements supportive measures designed to effectively restore or preserve the complainant's access to the recipient's education program or activity, and the recipient also informs the complainant in writing of the right to file a formal complaint. This safe harbor is now unworkable and unnecessary in light of other revisions made to the proposed regulations, specifically a recipient's obligations in § 106.44(a) and § 106.45(b)(10)(ii). Under § 106.44(a), a recipient's response must treat complainants and respondents equitably by offering supportive measures as defined in § 106.30, and a Title IX Coordinator must promptly contact the complainant to discuss the availability of supportive measures as defined in § 106.30, consider the complainant's wishes with respect to supportive measures, inform the complainant of the availability of supportive measures with or without the filing of a formal complaint, and explain to the complainant the process for filing a formal complaint. As previously explained, § 106.45(b)(1) now contains an additional mandate that with or without a formal complaint, a recipient must comply with § 106.44(a), which places recipients on notice that it must offer supportive measures to a complainant. Additionally, under § 106.45(b)(10)(ii), if a recipient does not provide a complainant with supportive measures, then the recipient must document why such a response was not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances. As recipients are now required to offer supportive measures to a complainant and to document why not providing a complainant with supportive measures was not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances, the final regulations no longer provides a safe harbor. Recipients cannot receive a safe harbor for offering supportive measures because recipients are now required to offer supportive measures under these final regulations. Accordingly, the Department does not include the proposed safe harbor regarding supportive measures in these final regulations.

With respect to concerns that respondents may suffer disciplinary sanctions or punitive action stemming from pending allegations, the Department notes that § 106.44(a) expressly provides that a recipient's response must treat complainants and respondents equitably by offering supportive measures as defined in § 106.30 to a complainant, and by following a grievance process that complies with § 106.45 before the imposition of any disciplinary sanctions or other actions that are not supportive measures as defined in § 106.30, against a respondent. Additionally, supportive measures in § 106.30 are expressly defined as non-disciplinary, non-punitive individualized services offered as appropriate, as reasonably available, and without fee or charge to the complainant or the respondent. Supportive measures must not have a punitive or disciplinary consequence for either complainants or respondents.

Even without the proposed safe harbor provision regarding supportive measures, the Department believes that these final regulations appropriately draw recipients' attention to the importance of offering supportive measures to all students, including students who do not wish to initiate a recipient's formal grievance process, and thus give complainants greater autonomy to decide if supportive measures, alone, represent the kind of school-level response that will best help the complainant heal after any trauma. The Department in part requires a recipient to offer supportive measures to all complainants under § 106.44(a) because the Department recognizes that, in many cases, a complainant's equal access to education can be effectively restored or preserved through the school's provision of supportive measures. Accordingly, the Department provides an additional mandate in § 106.44(b)(1), that with or without a formal complaint, a recipient must comply with § 106.44(a) (e.g., by offering the complainant supportive measures).

We are persuaded by commenters' assertions that providing supportive measures to a complainant does not always satisfy a recipient's obligation to respond in a non-deliberately indifferent manner to known sexual harassment. In some circumstances and depending on the unique facts, a non-deliberately indifferent response may require the recipient's Title IX Coordinator to sign a formal complaint as defined in § 106.30 so that the recipient initiates the grievance process in § 106.45. The Department acknowledges that a recipient should respect the complainant's autonomy and wishes with respect to a formal complaint and grievance process to the extent possible.

As the proposed safe harbor regarding supportive measures is no longer included in these final regulations, we do not revisit whether excluding elementary and secondary school recipients from this safe harbor was preferable to modifying the proposed safe harbor to also apply to elementary and secondary schools. Revised § 106.44(a) requires every recipient (including elementary and secondary schools) to offer supportive measures to complainants.

The Department understands the concern that a recipient may coerce potential complainants into accepting supportive measures in lieu of a formal grievance process. Partly in response to these concerns, the Department revised § 106.44(a) to require that a Title IX Coordinator promptly contact a complainant not only to discuss supportive measures but also to explain to the complainant the process for filing a formal complaint. Accordingly, a complainant will know how to file a formal complaint, if the complainant wishes to do so. We have also added § 106.71 to expressly forbid a recipient from threatening, intimidating, coercing, or discriminating against any complainant for the purpose of chilling the complainant's exercise of any rights under Title IX, which includes the right to file a formal complaint, and to receive supportive measures even if the complainant chooses not to file a formal complaint.

The Department agrees that the safe harbor, as proposed, is redundant, especially in light of the revisions to § 106.44(a), requiring a recipient to offer supportive measures to a complainant. As this safe harbor is not included in these final regulations, this safe harbor does not provide a way for a recipient to avoid responsibility.

For reasons discussed above, the Department declines to revise the final regulations to include a statute of limitations or similar time limit on filing a formal complaint but as discussed in the ''Formal Complaint'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble, the Department has revised the final regulations to provide that at the time of filing a formal complaint, the complainant must be participating in or attempting to participate in the recipient's education program or activity. This provides a reasonable condition on a complainant's ability to require a recipient to investigate, based on the complainant's connection to the recipient's education program or activity rather than by imposing a statute of limitations or similar time-based deadline. A complainant may be ''attempting to participate'' in the recipient's education program or activity in a broad variety of circumstances that do not depend on a complainant being, for instance, enrolled as a student or employed as an employee. A complainant may be ''attempting to participate,'' for example, where the complainant has withdrawn from the school due to alleged sexual harassment and expresses a desire to re-enroll if the recipient responds appropriately to the sexual harassment allegations, or if the complainant has graduated but would like to participate in alumni events at the school, or if the complainant is on a leave of absence to seek counseling to recover from trauma. In addition, the Department has also revised the final regulations to provide in § 106.45(b)(3)(ii) that a recipient has the discretion to dismiss a formal complaint against a respondent who is no longer enrolled or employed by the recipient. While these provisions are not an express limit on the amount of time a complainant has to file a formal complaint, the Department believes these provisions help address commenters' concerns about being forced to expend resources investigating situations where one or both parties have no affiliation with the recipient, without arbitrarily or unreasonably imposing a deadline on complainants, in recognition that complainants sometimes do not report or desire to pursue a formal process in the immediate aftermath of a sexual harassment incident.

Changes: The Department does not include the safe harbor provision proposed in the NPRM as § 106.44(b)(3). The Department adds a mandate to § 106.44(b)(1) that the recipient must comply with § 106.44(a), with or without a formal complaint.

Section 106.44(b)(2) OCR Will Not Re-Weigh the Evidence

Comments: Some commenters appreciated that the proposed rules contained an express guarantee that an institution will not be deemed deliberately indifferent solely because the Assistant Secretary would have reached a different determination regarding responsibility based on an independent weighing of the evidence. Some commenters expressed concerns that § 106.44(b)(2) would result in a lack of accountability or oversight for how schools or colleges handle sexual harassment complaints. Other commenters contended that this provision would unjustifiably reduce the Department's oversight unless a school's actions are clearly unreasonable. Some commenters asserted that the provision would improperly defer to a school district's determination, which commenters argued is not always the appropriate way to ensure Title IX accountability. A number of commenters felt that § 106.44(b)(2) would spur more civil lawsuits to hold schools accountable, because the Department would no longer be holding schools accountable.

Several commenters argued that the proposed provision would negatively impact OCR's ability to investigate non-compliance under Title IX, which would dangerously lower the bar of compliance and signal that a bare, minimal response to sexual harassment would suffice. Other commenters warned that the provision would limit OCR's ability to evaluate a school's response to sexual harassment, which would effectively narrow over 20 years of Title IX enforcement standards. Several commenters expressed their belief that OCR plays a key role as an independent, impartial investigator. For example, one commenter argued that OCR, as an independent entity, is more qualified than a school to perform an impartial investigation because the school has its own financial interests at stake and is thus less likely to identify inaccuracies in its own procedures. Another commenter asserted that OCR's independent weighing of evidence is a relevant factor because it may allow OCR to identify patterns or practices of shielding respondents or favoring complainants; the commenter argued that OCR should, after a thorough investigation, have discretion to decide if a school's determination regarding responsibility was discriminatory.

Some commenters expressed concern that proposed § 106.44(b)(2) was one-sided in a way that favored only respondents, because the language in the proposed provision would give deference to the school's determinations only where a respondent has been found not responsible. Commenters argued that as proposed, § 106.44(b)(2) would require OCR investigators to close investigations even if OCR found gross or malicious procedural violations affecting the determination reached by the school, as long as the school had determined the respondent to be not responsible. Another commenter expressed concern that a deferential procedural review by OCR may incentivize schools to find in favor of respondents so as to avoid OCR scrutiny; commenters argued that this would be perceived as biased against complainants, may chill reporting of sexual harassment at the school level, and would discourage complainants from filing OCR complaints alleging procedural defects that led to erroneous findings of non-responsibility.

Another commenter asserted that proposed § 106.44(b)(2) was inconsistent with Equal Employment Opportunity Commission (EEOC) practices with respect to employee sexual harassment claims; the commenter stated that the EEOC never defers to an employer's conclusion but conducts its own investigation and makes an independent assessment of the facts so that employers do not avoid liability merely by conducting exculpatory internal investigations. The commenter also asserted that applying § 106.44(b)(2) to employee sexual harassment claims would conflict with U.S. Department of Justice equal employment opportunity coordination regulations' requirement that a referring agency must give due weight to an EEOC determination of reasonable cause to believe that Title VII has been violated,[943] which OCR could not give if it instead gave conclusive weight to a recipient's contrary factual determination.

Conversely, some commenters expressed support for § 106.44(b)(2). Commenters asserted that this provision, combined with other provisions in the proposed rules, would assist colleges and universities in ensuring an impartial, transparent, and fair process for both complainants and respondents, while also providing institutions flexibility reflecting their unique attributes (e.g., size, student population, location, mission). Several commenters expressed support for OCR not ''second guessing'' a school's response to incidents of sexual harassment. One commenter asserted that the provision was reasonable because OCR should not intrude into a school's decision making based on OCR's own weighing of the evidence.

One commenter expressed confusion as to whether OCR would defer to schools' determinations about sex discrimination not involving sexual harassment, or in instances when a person who filed a complaint with a recipient could have filed directly with OCR. Another commenter suggested clarifying that further scrutiny by OCR is not barred by this provision and may be called for if a responsibility determination seems to hold little basis.

Discussion: We appreciate commenters' concerns about, and support of, § 106.44(b)(2). The intent of this provision is to convey that the Department will not overturn the outcome of a Title IX grievance process solely based on whether the Department might have weighed the evidence in the case differently from how the recipient's decision-maker weighed the evidence.

This provision does not limit OCR's ability to evaluate a school's response to sexual harassment, and it does not narrow Title IX enforcement standards; OCR retains its full ability, and responsibility, to oversee recipients' adherence to the requirements of Title IX, including requirements imposed under these final regulations. The Department agrees with commenters who stated that OCR has special qualifications that enable OCR to perform independent, impartial investigations into whether recipients have violated Title IX and Title IX regulations. The Department will continue to vigorously enforce recipients' Title IX obligations.[944] The Department believes that the § 106.45 grievance process prescribes fair procedures likely to result in reliable outcomes; however, when a recipient does not comply with the requirements of § 106.45, nothing in § 106.44(b)(2) precludes the Department from holding the recipient accountable for violating these final regulations. Refraining from second guessing the determination reached by a recipient's decision-maker solely because the evidence could have been weighed differently does not prevent OCR from identifying and correcting any violations the recipient may have committed during the Title IX grievance process. The deference given to the recipient's determination regarding responsibility in § 106.44(b)(2) does not preclude OCR from overturning a determination regarding responsibility where setting aside the recipient's determination is necessary to remedy a recipient's violations of these final regulations. Rather, § 106.44(b)(2) promotes finality for parties and recipients by stating that OCR will not overturn determinations just because OCR would have weighed the evidence in the case differently. To clarify this point, we have revised § 106.44(b)(2) to use the phrase ''solely because'' instead of ''merely because.'' Nothing about § 106.44(b)(2) prevents OCR from taking into account the determination regarding responsibility as one of the factors OCR considers in deciding whether a recipient has complied with these final regulations, and whether any violations of these final regulations may require setting aside the determination regarding responsibility in order to remediate a recipient's violations.

If a recipient has not complied with any provision of the final regulations, nothing in § 106.44(b)(2) prevents OCR from holding the recipient accountable for non-compliance. The intent of the provision is to assure recipients that because the § 106.45 grievance process contains robust procedural and substantive requirements designed to produce reliable outcomes, OCR will not substitute its judgment for that of the recipient's decision-maker with respect to weighing the relevant evidence at issue in a particular case.

We believe that this limited deference also serves the interests of complainants and respondents in resolving sexual harassment allegations, by limiting the circumstances under which a ''final'' determination reached by the recipient may be subject to being setting aside and requiring the parties to go through a grievance process for a second time. As an example, if a decision-maker evaluates the relevant evidence in a case and judges one witness to be more credible than another witness, or finds one item of relevant evidence to be more persuasive than another item of relevant evidence, § 106.44(b)(2) provides that OCR will not set aside the determination regarding responsibility solely because OCR would have found the other witness more credible or the other item of evidence more persuasive. It does not mean that OCR would refrain from holding the recipient accountable for violations of the decision-maker's obligations, for instance to avoid basing credibility determinations on a party's status as a complainant, respondent, or witness.[945] This provision does not meant that OCR would refrain from, for instance, independently determining that evidence deemed relevant by the decision-maker was in fact irrelevant and should not have been relied upon.[946] Violations of these final regulations may indeed result in a recipient's determination regarding responsibility being set aside by OCR, but determinations will not be overturned ''solely'' because OCR would have weighed the evidence differently.

Some commenters understood this provision to work in a one-sided way, giving recipients' determinations regarding responsibility deference only where a respondent has been found not responsible; one commenter reached this conclusion based on the provision's reference to ''deliberate indifference'' which is a theory usually only raised by complainants challenging the sufficiency of a recipient's response to sexual harassment. The Department appreciates these commenters' concerns; we intend this provision to apply equally to all outcomes, regardless of whether the determination found a respondent responsible or not responsible. For this reason, the provision uses the phrase ''determination regarding responsibility'' (emphasis added) and not determination of responsibility.[947] However, to clarify that this provision applies to all determinations of the outcome of a Title IX grievance process regardless of whether the respondent was found responsible or not responsible, we have revised § 106.44(b)(2) by adding ''or otherwise evidence of discrimination under title IX by the recipient'' so that the reference in this provision to ''deliberate indifference'' is not misunderstood to exclude theories of sex discrimination commonly raised by respondents after being found responsible. This additional phrase in § 106.44(b)(2) clarifies that this provision operates neutrally to all determinations regarding responsibility. The Department will not overturn the recipient's finding solely because the Department would have reached a different determination based on an independent weighing of the evidence, irrespective of whether the recipient found in favor of the complainant or the respondent. Whether the recipient found the respondent not responsible (and thus a complainant might allege deliberate indifference) or the recipient found the respondent responsible (and thus a respondent might allege sex discrimination under Title IX on a theory such as selective enforcement or erroneous outcome), this provision would equally apply to give deference to the recipient's determination where the challenge to the determination is solely based on whether the Department might have weighed the evidence differently.

In no manner does this limited deference by the Department restrict the Department's ability to identify patterns or practices of sex discrimination, or to investigate allegations of a recipient committing gross or malicious violations of Title IX or these final regulations. This provision gives a recipient deference only as to the decision-maker's weighing of evidence with respect to a determination regarding responsibility. Section 106.44(b)(2) simply clarifies OCR's role and standard of review under these final regulations, by providing that OCR will not conduct de novo reviews of determinations absent allegations that the recipient failed in some way to comply with Title IX or these final regulations. The provision is intended to alleviate potential confusion recipients may feel about needing to successfully predict how the Department would make factual [947] We use the phrase ''determination of responsibility'' (emphasis added) to describe a finding that the respondent is responsible for perpetrating sexual harassment, and ''determination regarding responsibility'' to describe a determination irrespective of whether that determination has found the respondent responsible, or not responsible. E.g., compare §§ 106.45(b)(1)(i) and 106.45(b)(1)(vi) with §§ 106.45(b)(1)(iv), 106.45(b)(2), 106.45(b)(5)(i), 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii), 106.45(b)(6) through 106.45(b)(10).

determinations ''in the shoes'' of the recipient's decision-maker.

Indeed, it would be impractical and unhelpful, for all parties, if the Department conducted de novo reviews of all recipient determinations. Doing so would contravene the Department's goal of providing consistency, predictability, transparency, and reasonably prompt resolution, in Title IX grievance processes. The Department disagrees that § 106.44(b)(2) ''dangerously'' lowers the bar of compliance by signaling that recipients need only provide a ''bare minimum response'' to sexual harassment. The requirements of the final regulations do not constitute a low bar; rather, these final regulations expect—and the Department will hold recipients accountable for—responses to sexual harassment allegations that support complainants and treat both parties fairly by complying with specific, mandatory obligations. For instance, under the final regulations recipients are required to offer supportive measures to every complainant regardless of whether a grievance process is ever initiated.[948] When a recipient does investigate a complainant's sexual harassment allegations, the final regulations prescribe a grievance process that lays out clear, practical steps for processing a formal complaint of Title IX sexual harassment, including requirements that recipients: Treat complainants and respondents equitably by providing remedies for complainants when a respondent is found responsible, and a grievance process prior to imposing disciplinary sanctions or other actions that are not supportive measures, against a respondent; [949] objectively evaluate all relevant evidence and give both parties equal opportunity to present witnesses and evidence; [950] not harbor a bias or conflict of interest against either party; [951] and resolve the allegations under designated, reasonably prompt time frames.[952] The Department will hold recipients accountable to follow these, and all the other, requirements set forth in § 106.45, whether failure to comply affected the complainant, the respondent, or both parties.

The Department does not agree that § 106.44(b)(2) will lead to increased litigation. The final regulations require recipients to protect complainants' equal educational access, while at the same time providing both parties due process protections throughout any grievance process, and § 106.44(b)(2) does not impair the Department's ability to hold recipients accountable for meeting these obligations. The Department does not believe that courts are inclined through private lawsuits to second guess a recipient's determinations regarding responsibility absent allegations that the recipient arrived at a determination due to discrimination, bias, procedural irregularity, deprivation of constitutionally guaranteed due process protections, or other defect that affected the outcome; in other words, the limited deference in § 106.44(b)(2) is no greater than the deference courts generally also give to recipients' determinations.[953] As discussed in the ''Litigation Risk'' subsection of the ''Miscellaneous'' section of this preamble, the Department believes that these final regulations may have the effect of reducing litigation arising out of recipients' responses to sexual harassment.

These final regulations do not apply to the EEOC and do not dictate how the EEOC will administer Title VII or its implementing regulations. If the Assistant Secretary refers a complaint filed with OCR to the EEOC under Title VII or 28 CFR 42.605, then the EEOC will make a determination under its own regulations and not the Department's regulations. Even if the Department is required to give due weight to the EEOC's determination regarding Title VII under 28 CFR 42.610(a), the Department does not have authority to administer or enforce Title VII. There may be incidents of sexual harassment that implicate both Title VII and Title IX, and this Department will continue to administer Title IX and its implementing regulations and to defer to the EEOC to administer Title VII and its implementing regulations. Nothing in these final regulations precludes the Department from giving due weight to the EEOC's determination regarding Title VII under 28 CFR 42.610(a).[954] The Department recognizes that employers must fulfill their obligations under Title VII and also under Title IX. There is no inherent conflict between Title VII and Title IX, and the Department will construe Title IX and its implementing regulations in a manner to avoid an actual conflict between an employer's obligations under Title VII and Title IX.

The Department wishes to clarify that § 106.44(b)(2) applies only to determinations regarding responsibility reached in a § 106.45 grievance process, which in turn applies only to formal complaints (defined in § 106.30 to mean allegations of sexual harassment); the § 106.45 grievance process does not apply to complaints about other types of sex discrimination. Complaints about sex discrimination that is not sexual harassment may be filed with the recipient for processing under the prompt and equitable grievance procedures that recipients must adopt under § 106.8. We appreciate the opportunity to clarify that no regulation or Department practice precludes a person from filing a complaint with OCR, whether or not the person also could have filed, or did file, a complaint with the school.

Changes: Section 106.44(b)(2) is revised to reference not only deliberate indifference but also other sex discrimination under Title IX, and to replace the word ''merely'' with ''solely'' in the phrase describing situations in which the Assistant Secretary would have reached a different determination based on an independent weighing of the evidence.

The Department's view of restraint from conducting de novo review of recipient determinations regarding responsibility is consistent with judicial views recognizing that this type of limited restraint in no way impairs the ability of the courts to effectuate the purposes of Federal and State civil rights statutes. Similarly, § 106.44(b)(2) in no way impairs the Department's ability to effectuate the purposes of Title IX.

[954] 28 CFR 42.610(c) also states: ''If the referring agency determines that the recipient has not violated any applicable civil rights provision(s) which the agency has a responsibility to enforce, the agency shall notify the complainant, the recipient, and the Assistant Attorney General and the Chairman of the EEOC in writing of the basis of that determination.'' Accordingly, these regulations contemplate that each agency enforces the civil rights provisions that the agency has the responsibility to enforce.

Additional Rules Governing Recipients' Responses to Sexual Harassment

Section 106.44(c) Emergency Removal

Overall Support and Opposition to Emergency Removals

Comments: Some commenters believed that § 106.44(c) provides due process protections for respondents while protecting campus safety. Some commenters supported this provision because it allows educational institutions to respond to situations of immediate danger, while protecting respondents from unfair or unnecessary removals. At least one commenter appreciated the latitude granted to educational institutions under § 106.44(c) to determine how to address safety emergencies arising from allegations of sexual harassment. Some commenters asserted that this provision appropriately reflects many schools' existing behavior risk assessment procedures. Several commenters supported § 106.44(c) and recounted personal stories of how a respondent was removed from classes, or from school, and the negative impact the removal had on that student's professional, academic, or extracurricular life because the removal seemed to presume the ''guilt'' of the respondent without allegations ever being proved.

Some commenters wanted to omit the emergency removal provision entirely, arguing that if administrators at the postsecondary level have the power to preemptively suspend or expel a student, on the pretext of an emergency, then every sexual misconduct situation could be deemed an emergency and respondents would never receive the due process protections of the § 106.45 grievance process. One commenter suggested that instead of permitting removals, all allegations of sexual harassment should simply go through a more rapid investigation so that the respondent may remain in school and victims are protected, while any falsely accused respondent is quickly exonerated. Some commenters requested that this removal power be limited because of the negative consequences of involuntary removal; one commenter suggested the provision be modified so that the removal must be ''narrowly tailored'' and ''no more extensive than is strictly necessary'' to mitigate the health or safety risk. One commenter asserted that this provision should also require that interim emergency removals be based on objective evidence and on current medical knowledge where appropriate, made by a licensed, qualified evaluator.

Some commenters asserted that emergency removals should not be used just because sexual harassment or assault has been alleged, and that § 106.44(c) should more clearly define what counts as an emergency. Some commenters argued that emergency removals should be allowed if the sexual harassment allegation involves rape, but no emergency removal should be allowed if the sexual harassment allegation involves offensive speech.

Commenters argued that § 106.44(c) is unclear as to what constitutes an immediate threat to health or safety. Several commenters argued that emergency removals should be restricted to instances where there is ''an immediate threat to safety'' (not health), while other commenters argued this provision must be limited to ''physical'' threats to health or safety. Commenters argued that a ''threat to health or safety'' is too nebulous a concept to justify immediate removal from campus. According to one commenter, even speaking on campus in favor of the NPRM could be construed by schools or student activists as a threat to the emotional or mental ''health or safety'' of survivors, even though discussion of public policy is core political speech protected by the First Amendment.

One commenter stated that the use of the plural ''students and employees'' in § 106.44(c) may preclude an institution from taking emergency action when the immediate threat is to a single student or employee. Commenters argued that postsecondary institutions need the flexibility to address immediate threats to the safety of one student or employee in the same manner as threats to multiple students or employees. Some commenters asserted that § 106.44(c) would unreasonably limit a postsecondary institution's ability to protect persons and property, or to protect against potential disruption of the educational environment, and argued that an institution should have the discretion to invoke an emergency removal under circumstances beyond those listed in § 106.44(c). Commenters argued that § 106.44(c) is too limiting because it does not allow recipients to pursue an emergency removal where the respondent poses a threat of illegal conduct that is not about a health or safety emergency; commenters contended this will subject the complainant or others to ongoing illegal conduct just because it does not constitute a threat to health or safety. Commenters argued that in addition to a health or safety threat, this provision should consider the need to restore or preserve equal access to education as justification for emergency removals. One commenter asserted that a legitimate reason to institute an emergency removal of a respondent is a threat that the respondent may obstruct the collection of relevant information regarding the sexual harassment allegations at issue.

One commenter cited New York Education Law Article 129–B as an example of a detailed framework under which campus officials may conduct an individualized threat assessment, order an interim suspension, and provide due process; commenters asserted that courts hold that the due process required for an interim suspension does not need to consist of a full hearing.[955] Another commenter argued that this provision would constitute an unprecedented Federal preemption of Oregon's existing State and local student discipline rules, which establish the due process requirements for emergency removals from school. Commenters argued that § 106.44(c) would create a higher level of due process for emergency removals in situations that involve alleged sexual harassment than for any other behavioral violation, and that the proposed rules are unclear whether this heightened procedural requirement is triggered only when a complainant alleges sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, or is also triggered in any case where a complainant alleges sexual harassment that meets a State law definition or school code of conduct that may define sexual harassment more broadly than conduct meeting the § 106.30 definition.

Some commenters suggested that § 106.44(c) be modified to require periodic review of any emergency removal decision, to promote transparency and eliminate the possibility of leaving a respondent on interim suspension indefinitely. Commenters argued that immediate removal is very traumatic, and respondents who have been removed have a significant potential to react by harming themselves or others thus recipients should reduce these risks by ensuring a safe exit plan with adequate support for the respondent in place.

Commenters asserted that the goal should be to preserve educational opportunities for all parties involved to the extent possible, so § 106.44(c) should require recipients to provide alternative academic accommodations for respondents who are removed. Some commenters suggested that this provision should address a respondent's access to a recipient's program or activity, post-removal. Because emergency removal is not premised on a finding of responsibility and occurs ex parte, commenters argued that the recipient should be required to provide a respondent with alternative access to the respondent's academic classes during the period of removal and that failure to do so would be sex discrimination against the respondent. Some commenters argued that as to a respondent who is removed on an emergency basis and later found to be not responsible, the final regulations should require the recipient to mitigate the damage caused by the removal, for example, by allowing the respondent to retake classes or exams missed during the removal. One commenter suggested that a recipient should secure the personal property of the removed person (such as the respondent's vehicle) and be responsible for any loss or damage occurring to personal property during a removal.

Other commenters asserted that an individualized risk assessment should be required after every report of sexual assault. Commenters argued that because insurance statistics show a high degree of recidivism among college rapists, and because Title IX is also supposed to deter discrimination based on sex, schools should be required to consider the safety of other students on their campus if they know there is a possible sexual assailant in their midst.

One commenter suggested that licensing board procedures provide the best model for campus procedures because they offer the closest parallel to the types of behavior evaluated and issues at stake for respondents such as reputation, future livelihood, and future opportunities; the commenter asserted that court precedents hold that both public and private recipients must follow principles of fundamental due process and fundamental fairness in disciplinary processes,[956] and professional licensing board procedures adequately protect due process. One commenter applauded the Department for proposing to provide greater due process protections than what current procedures typically provide; however, this commenter asserted that Native American students attending institutions funded by the Bureau of Indian Affairs receive strong due process protections, including greater due process with respect to emergency removals than what § 106.44(c) provides, and the commenter contended that the stronger due process protections should be extended to non-Native American institutions.[957] According to this commenter, unlike Native American students attending schools funded by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, non-Native American students are at risk for permanent removal from campus with potentially devastating consequences.

One commenter asserted that § 106.44(c) should explicitly require the recipient to comply with the Clery Act, notify appropriate authorities, and provide any necessary safety interventions. Another commenter stated that recipients should be required to publicly report the annual number of emergency removals the recipient conducts under § 106.44(c).

Some commenters asserted that recipients need to do more than simply remove a respondent from its education program or activity. Commenters argued that trauma from sexual assault may cause a complainant to withdraw from an education program or activity, including due to fear of seeing the respondent, suggested that more resources should be made available to complainants, and asserted that the final regulations should specify best practices addressing how a recipient should respond to immediate threats.

Discussion: We appreciate commenters' support for the emergency removal provision in § 106.44(c). Revised in ways explained below, § 106.44(c) provides that in situations where a respondent poses an immediate threat to the physical health and safety of any individual before an investigation into sexual harassment allegations concludes (or where no grievance process is pending), a recipient may remove the respondent from the recipient's education programs or activities. A recipient may need to undertake an emergency removal in order to fulfill its duty not to be deliberately indifferent under § 106.44(a) and protect the safety of the recipient's community, and § 106.44(c) permits recipients to remove respondents in emergency situations that arise out of allegations of conduct that could constitute sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30. Emergency removal may be undertaken in addition to implementing supportive measures designed to restore or preserve a complainant's equal access to education.[958] While we recognize that emergency removal may have serious consequences for a respondent, we decline to remove this provision because where a genuine emergency exists, recipients need the authority to remove a respondent while providing notice and opportunity for the respondent to challenge that decision.

The Department does not believe that rushing all allegations of sexual harassment or sexual assault through expedited grievance procedures adequately promotes a fair grievance process, and forbidding an emergency removal until conclusion of a grievance process (no matter how expedited such a process reasonably could be) might impair a recipient's ability to quickly respond to an emergency situation. The § 106.45 grievance process is designed to provide both parties with a prompt, fair investigation and adjudication likely to reach an accurate determination regarding the responsibility of the respondent for perpetrating sexual harassment. Emergency removal under § 106.44(c) is not a substitute for reaching a determination as to a respondent's responsibility for the sexual harassment allegations; rather, emergency removal is for the purpose of addressing imminent threats posed to any person's physical health or safety, which might arise out of the sexual harassment allegations. Upon reaching a determination that a respondent is responsible for sexual harassment, the final regulations do not restrict a recipient's discretion to impose a disciplinary sanction against the respondent, including suspension, expulsion, or other removal from the recipient's education program or activity. Section 106.44(c) allows recipients to address emergency situations, whether or not a grievance process is underway, provided that the recipient first undertakes an individualized safety and risk analysis and provides the respondent notice and opportunity to challenge the removal decision. We do not believe it is necessary to restrict a recipient's emergency removal authority to removal decisions that are ''narrowly tailored'' to address the risk because § 106.44(c) adequately requires that the threat ''justifies'' the removal. If the high threshold for removal under § 106.44(c) exists (i.e., an individualized safety and risk analysis determines the respondent poses an immediate threat to any person's physical health or safety), then we believe the recipient should have discretion to determine the appropriate scope and conditions of removal of the respondent from the recipient's education program or activity. Similarly, we decline to require recipients to follow more prescriptive requirements to undertake an emergency removal (such as requiring that the assessment be based on objective evidence, current medical knowledge, or performed by a licensed evaluator). While such detailed requirements might apply to a recipient's risk assessments under other laws, for the purposes of these final regulations under Title IX, the Department desires to leave as much flexibility as possible for recipients to address any immediate threat to the physical health or safety of any student or other individual. Nothing in these final regulations precludes a recipient from adopting a policy or practice of relying on objective evidence, current medical knowledge, or a licensed evaluator when considering emergency removals under § 106.44(c).

We agree that emergency removal is not appropriate in every situation where sexual harassment has been alleged, but only in situations where an individualized safety and risk analysis determines that an immediate threat to the physical health or safety of any student or other individual justifies the removal, where the threat arises out of allegations of sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30. Because all the conduct that could constitute sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30 is serious conduct that jeopardizes a complainant's equal access to education, we decline to limit emergency removals only to instances where a complainant has alleged sexual assault or rape, or to prohibit emergency removals where the sexual harassment allegations involve verbal harassment. A threat posed by a respondent is not necessarily measured solely by the allegations made by the complainant; we have revised § 106.44(c) to add the phrase ''arising from the allegations of sexual harassment'' to clarify that the threat justifying a removal could consist of facts and circumstances ''arising from'' the sexual harassment allegations (and ''sexual harassment'' is a defined term, under § 106.30). For example, if a respondent threatens physical violence against the complainant in response to the complainant's allegations that the respondent verbally sexually harassed the complainant, the immediate threat to the complainant's physical safety posed by the respondent may ''arise from'' the sexual harassment allegations. As a further example, if a respondent reacts to being accused of sexual harassment by threatening physical self-harm, an immediate threat to the respondent's physical safety may ''arise from'' the allegations of sexual harassment and could justify an emergency removal. The ''arising from'' revision also clarifies that recipients do not need to rely on, or meet the requirements of, § 106.44(c) to address emergency situations that do not arise from sexual harassment allegations under Title IX (for example, where a student has brought a weapon to school unrelated to any sexual harassment allegations).

We are persuaded by commenters that § 106.44(c) should be clarified. The final regulations revise this provision to state that the risk posed by the respondent must be to the ''physical'' health or safety, of ''any student or other individual,'' arising from the allegations of sexual harassment. These revisions help ensure that this provision applies to genuine emergencies involving the physical health or safety of one or more individuals (including the respondent, complainant, or any other individual) and not only multiple students or employees. We agree with commenters who asserted that adding the word ''physical'' before ''health or safety'' will help ensure that the emergency removal provision is not used inappropriately to prematurely punish respondents by relying on a person's mental or emotional ''health or safety'' to justify an emergency removal, as the emotional and mental well-being of complainants may be addressed by recipients via supportive measures as defined in § 106.30. The revision to § 106.44(c) adding the word ''physical'' before ''health and safety'' and changing ''students or employees'' to ''any student or other individual'' also addresses commenters' concerns that the proposed rules were not specific enough about what kind of threat justifies an emergency removal; the latter revision clarifies that the threat might be to the physical health or safety of one or more persons, including the complainant, the respondent themselves, or any other individual. We decline to remove ''health'' from the ''physical health or safety'' phrase in this provision because an emergency situation could arise from a threat to the physical health, or the physical safety, of a person, and because ''health or safety'' is a relatively recognized term used to describe emergency circumstances.[959]

We decline to add further bases that could justify an emergency removal under § 106.44(c). We recognize the importance of the need to restore or preserve equal access to education, but disagree that it should be a justification for emergency removal; supportive measures are intended to address restoration and preservation of equal educational access, while § 106.44(c) is intended to apply to genuine emergencies that justify essentially punishing a respondent (by separating the respondent from educational opportunities and benefits) arising out of sexual harassment allegations without having fairly, reliably determined whether the respondent is responsible for the alleged sexual harassment. As explained above, we have revised § 106.44(c) to apply only where the immediate threat to a person's physical health or safety arises from the allegations of sexual harassment; this clarifies that where a respondent poses a threat of illegal conduct (perhaps not constituting a threat to physical health or safety) that does not arise from the sexual harassment allegations, this provision does not apply. Nothing in these final regulations precludes a recipient from addressing a respondent's commission of illegal conduct under the recipient's own code of conduct, or pursuant to other laws, where such illegal conduct does not constitute sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30 or is not ''arising from the sexual harassment allegations.'' We disagree that a recipient's assessment that a respondent poses a threat of obstructing the sexual harassment investigation, or destroying relevant evidence, justifies an emergency removal under this provision, because this provision is intended to ensure that recipients have authority and discretion to address health or safety emergencies arising out of sexual harassment allegations, not to address all forms of misconduct that a respondent might commit during a grievance process.

The Department appreciates commenters' concerns that State or local law may present other considerations or impose other requirements before an emergency removal can occur. To the extent that other applicable laws establish additional relevant standards for emergency removals, recipients should also heed such standards. To the greatest degree possible, State and local law ought to be reconciled with the final regulations, but to the extent there is a direct conflict, the final regulations prevail.[960] While commenters correctly note that a ''full hearing'' is not a constitutional due process requirement in all interim suspension situations, § 106.44(c) does not impose a requirement to hold a ''full hearing'' and in fact, does not impose any pre-deprivation due process requirements; the opportunity for a respondent to challenge an emergency removal decision need only occur post-deprivation. For reasons described in the ''Role of Due Process in the Grievance Process'' section of this preamble, the Department has determined that postsecondary institutions must hold live hearings to reach determinations regarding responsibility for sexual harassment. However, because § 106.44(c) is intended to give recipients authority to respond quickly to emergencies, and does not substitute for a determination regarding the responsibility of the respondent for the sexual harassment allegations at issue, recipients need only provide respondents the basic features of due process (notice and opportunity), and may do so after removal rather than before a removal occurs. An emergency removal under § 106.44(c) does not authorize a recipient to impose an interim suspension or expulsion on a respondent because the respondent has been accused of sexual harassment. Rather, this provision authorizes a recipient to remove a respondent from the recipient's education program or activity (whether or not the recipient labels such a removal as an interim suspension or expulsion, or uses any different label to describe the removal) when an individualized safety and risk analysis determines that an imminent threat to the physical health or safety of any person, arising from sexual harassment allegations, justifies removal.

Section 106.44(c) expressly acknowledges that recipients may be obligated under applicable disability laws to conduct emergency removals differently with respect to individuals with disabilities, and these final regulations do not alter a recipient's obligation to adhere to the IDEA, Section 504, or the ADA. Due to a recipient's obligations under applicable State laws or disability laws, uniformity with respect to how a recipient addresses all cases involving immediate threats to physical health and safety may not be possible. However, the Department believes that § 106.44(c) appropriately balances the need for schools to remove a respondent posing an immediate threat to the physical health or safety of any person, with the need to ensure that such an ability is not used inappropriately, for instance to bypass the prohibition in § 106.44(a) and § 106.45(b)(1)(i) against imposition of disciplinary sanctions or other actions that are not supportive measures against a respondent without first following the § 106.45 grievance process. The Department does not believe that a lower threshold for an emergency removal appropriately balances these interests, even if this means that emergency removals arising from allegations of sexual harassment must meet a higher standard than when a threat arises from conduct allegations unrelated to Title IX sexual harassment. In response to commenters' reasonable concerns about the potential for confusion, we have added the phrase ''arising from the allegations of sexual harassment'' (and ''sexual harassment'' is a defined term under § 106.30) into this provision to clarify that this emergency removal provision only governs situations that arise under Title IX, and not under State or other laws that might apply to other emergency situations.

The Department does not see a need to add language stating that the emergency removal must be periodically reviewed. Emergency removal is not a substitute for the § 106.45 grievance process, and § 106.45(b)(1)(v) requires reasonably prompt time frames for that grievance process. We acknowledge that a recipient could remove a respondent under § 106.44(c) without a formal complaint having triggered the § 106.45 grievance process; in such situations, the requirements in § 106.44(c) giving the respondent notice and opportunity to be heard post-removal suffice to protect a respondent from a removal without a fair process for challenging that outcome, and the Department does not believe it is necessary to require periodic review of the removal decision. We decline to impose layers of complexity onto the emergency removal process, leaving procedures in recipients' discretion; in many cases, recipients will develop a ''safe exit plan'' as part of implementing an emergency removal, and accommodate students who have been removed on an emergency basis with alternative means to continue academic coursework during a removal period or provide for a respondent to re-take classes upon a return from an emergency removal, or secure personal property left on a recipient's campus when a respondent is removed. We disagree that a recipient's failure to refusal to take any of the foregoing steps necessarily constitutes sex discrimination under Title IX, although a recipient would violate Title IX by, for example, applying different policies to female respondents than to male respondents removed on an emergency basis. Nothing in the final regulations prevents students who have been removed from asserting rights under State law or contract against the recipient arising from a removal under this provision.

We decline to require an individualized safety and risk analysis upon every reported sexual assault, because the § 106.45 grievance process is designed to bring all relevant evidence concerning sexual harassment allegations to the decision-maker's attention so that a determination regarding responsibility is reached fairly and reliably. A recipient is obligated under § 106.44(a) to provide a complainant with a non-deliberately indifferent response to a sexual assault report, which includes offering supportive measures designed to protect the complainant's safety, and if a recipient does not provide a complainant with supportive measures, then the recipient must document the reasons why such a response was not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances pursuant to § 106.45(b)(10)(ii). Emergency removals under § 106.44(c) remain an option for recipients to respond to situations where an individualized safety and risk analysis determines that a respondent poses an immediate threat to health or safety.

The Department appreciates commenters' assertions that § 106.44(c) should provide more due process protections, similar to those applied in professional licensing board cases or under Federal laws that apply to schools funded by the Bureau of Indian Affairs; however, we believe that § 106.44(c) appropriately balances a recipient's need to protect individuals from emergency threats, with providing adequate due process to the respondent under such emergency circumstances. Notice and an opportunity to be heard constitute the fundamental features of procedural due process, and the Department does not wish to prescribe specific procedures that a recipient must apply in emergency situations. Accordingly, the Department does not wish to adopt the same due process protections that commenters asserted are applied in professional licensing revocation proceedings, or that are provided to Native American students in schools funded by the Bureau of Indian Affairs. The Department acknowledges that schools receiving funding from the Bureau of Indian Affairs must provide even greater due process protections than what these final regulations require, but these greater due process protections do not conflict with these final regulations. These final regulations govern a variety of recipients, including elementary and secondary schools and postsecondary institutions, but also recipients that are not educational institutions; for example, some libraries and museums are recipients of Federal financial assistance operating education programs or activities. These final regulations provide the appropriate amount of due process for a wide variety of recipients of Federal financial assistance with respect to a recipient's response to emergency situations.

As discussed in the ''Clery Act'' subsection of the ''Miscellaneous'' section of this preamble, postsecondary institutions subject to these Title IX regulations may also be subject to the Clery Act. We decline to state in § 106.44(c) that recipients must also comply with the Clery Act because we do not wish to create confusion about whether § 106.44(c) applies only to postsecondary institutions (because the Clery Act does not apply to elementary and secondary schools). We decline to require recipients to notify authorities, provide safety interventions, or annually report the number of emergency removals conducted under § 106.44(c), because we do not wish to prescribe requirements on recipients beyond what we have determined is necessary to fulfill the purpose of this provision: Granting recipients authority and discretion to appropriately respond to emergency situations arising from sexual harassment allegations. Nothing in these final regulations precludes a recipient from notifying authorities, providing safety interventions, or reporting the number of emergency removals, to comply with other laws requiring such steps or based on a recipient's desire to take such steps. For similar reasons, we decline to require recipients to adopt ''best practices'' for responding to threats. We note that these final regulations require recipients to offer supportive measures to every complainant, and do not preclude a recipient from providing resources to complainants or respondents.

Changes: We have revised § 106.44(c) so that a respondent removed on an emergency basis must pose an immediate threat to the ''physical'' health or safety (adding the word ''physical'') of ''any student or other individual'' (replacing the phrase ''students or employees''). We have also revised the proposed language to clarify that the justification for emergency removal must arise from allegations of sexual harassment under Title IX.

Intersection With the IDEA, Section 504, and ADA

Comments: Some commenters applauded the ''saving clause'' in § 106.44(c) acknowledging that the respondent may have rights under the IDEA, Section 504, or the ADA. Several commenters asserted that § 106.44(c) would create uncertainty regarding the interplay between Title IX and relevant disabilities laws, which would further exacerbate the uncertainty regarding involuntary removal of students who pose a threat to themselves. Other commenters stated that the result of this provision would likely be different handling of Title IX cases for students with disabilities versus students without disabilities because of the requirements of the IDEA, Section 504, and the ADA. Some commenters believed this provision (and the proposed rules overall) appear to give consideration to the rights and needs of respondents with disabilities, without similar consideration for the rights of complainants or witnesses with disabilities. Commenters asserted that § 106.44(c) is subject to problematic interpretation because by expressly referencing the IDEA, Section 504, and the ADA this provision might wrongly encourage schools to remove students with disabilities because of implicit bias against students with disabilities, especially students with intellectual disabilities.

One commenter suggested that § 106.44(c) should track the definition of ''direct threat'' used in the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission's (EEOC) regulations, upheld by the Supreme Court,[961] and as outlined in ADA regulations [962] because this would give recipients and respondents a clearer standard and reduce the chances that removal decisions will be based on generalizations, ignorance, fear, patronizing attitudes, or stereotypes regarding individuals with disabilities.

Some commenters argued that this provision conflicts with the IDEA, Section 504, and the ADA, and that removals are not as simple as conducting a mere risk assessment, because the IDEA governs emergency removal of students in elementary school who are receiving special education and related services.[963] Commenters asserted that under the IDEA, a school administrator cannot make a unilateral risk assessment, and placement decisions cannot be made by an administrator alone; rather, commenters argued, these decisions must be made by a team that includes the parent and relevant members of the IEP (Individualized Education Program) Team and if the conduct in question was a manifestation of a disability, the recipient cannot make a unilateral threat assessment and remove a child from school, absent extreme circumstances. These commenters further argued that sometimes certain behaviors are the result or manifestation of a disability, despite being sexually offensive, e.g., a student with Tourette's syndrome blurting out sexually offensive language. Commenters argued that under disability laws schools cannot remove those students from school without complying with the IDEA, Section 504, and the ADA. One commenter recommended that § 106.44(c) require, at a minimum, training for Title IX administrators on the intersection among Title IX and applicable disability laws. In the college setting, the commenter further recommended that Title IX Coordinators not be permitted to impose supportive measures that involve removal without feedback from administrators from the institution's office of disability services, provided that the student is registered with the pertinent office. If a student has an Individualized Education Plan (IEP) in secondary school, commenters recommended that the administration immediately call for a team meeting to determine the next steps.

Other commenters asserted that any language under § 106.44(c) must make clear that the free appropriate public education (FAPE) to which students with disabilities are entitled must continue, even in circumstances when emergency removal is deemed necessary under Title IX. Given this, one commenter recommended that the language in § 106.44(c) clarify that this provision does not supersede rights under disability laws.

Some commenters, while expressing overall support for § 106.44(c), requested additional guidance on the intersection of Title IX, the IDEA, and the ADA, and how elementary and secondary schools would implement § 106.44(c). The commenters asserted that the final regulations should be explicit that regardless of a student's IEP or ''504 plan'' under the IDEA or Section 504, the student is not allowed to engage in threatening or harmful behavior and that this would be similar to the response a campus might have to any other serious violation, such as bringing a firearm to class. Commenters also argued that the final regulations should clarify that separation of elementary and secondary school students with disabilities from classroom settings should be rare and only when done in compliance with the IDEA. Commenters argued that recipients must be made aware that a student with a disability does not have to be eligible for a free appropriate public education (FAPE) in order for § 106.44(c) to apply, and that recipients must not be misled into thinking there are different standards for elementary and secondary school and postsecondary education environments when it comes to equal access to educational opportunities.

Other commenters argued that § 106.44(c) may violate compulsory educational laws by removing elementary-age students from school on an emergency basis. When an elementary school student is removed under § 106.44(c), commenters wondered whether the school is supposed to have a designated site for housing or educating removed students during the investigation.

Discussion: Section 106.44(c) states that this provision does not modify any rights under the IDEA, Section 504, or the ADA. In the final regulations, we removed reference to certain titles of the ADA and refer instead to the ''Americans with Disabilities Act'' so that application of any portion of the ADA requires a recipient to meet ADA obligations while also complying with these final regulations. We disagree that this provision will create ambiguity or otherwise supersede rights that students have under these disability statutes. Additionally, we do not believe that expressly acknowledging recipients' obligations under disability laws incentivizes recipients to remove respondents with disabilities; rather, reference in this provision to those disability laws will help protect respondents from emergency removals that do not also protect the respondents' rights under applicable disability laws. With respect to implicit bias against students with disabilities, recipients must be careful to ensure that all emergency removal proceedings are impartial, without bias or conflicts of interest [964] and the final regulations do not preclude a recipient from providing training to employees, including Title IX personnel, regarding a recipient's obligations under both Title IX and applicable disability laws. Any different treatment between students without disabilities and students with disabilities with respect to emergency removals, may occur due to a recipient's need to comply with the IDEA, Section 504, the ADA, or other disability laws, but would not be permissible due to bias or stereotypes against individuals with disabilities.

As explained in the ''Directed Question 5: Individuals with Disabilities'' subsection of the ''Directed Questions'' section of this preamble, recipients have an obligation to comply with applicable disability laws with respect to complainants as well as respondents (and any other individual involved in a Title IX matter, such as a witness), and the reference to disability laws in § 106.44(c) does not obviate recipients' responsibilities to comply with disability laws with respect to other applications of these final regulations.

The Department appreciates commenters' suggestion to mirror the ''direct threat'' language utilized in ADA regulations; however, we have instead revised § 106.44(c) to refer to the physical health or safety of ''any student or other individual'' because this language better aligns this provision with the FERPA health and safety emergency exception, and avoids the confusion caused by the ''direct threat'' language under ADA regulations because those regulations refer to a ''direct threat to the health or safety of others'' [965] which does not clearly encompass a threat to the respondent themselves (e.g., where a respondent threatens self-harm). By revising § 106.44(c) to refer to a threat to the physical health or safety ''of any student or other individual'' this provision does encompass a respondent's threat of self-harm (when the threat arises from the allegations of sexual harassment), and is aligned with the language used in FERPA's health or safety exception.[966] We note that recipients still need to comply with applicable disability laws, including the ADA, in making emergency removal decisions.

The Department appreciates commenters' varied concerns that complying with these final regulations, and with disability laws, may pose challenges for recipients, including specific challenges for elementary and secondary schools, and postsecondary institutions, because of the intersection among the IDEA, Section 504, the ADA, and how to conduct an emergency removal under these final regulations under Title IX. The Department will offer technical assistance to recipients regarding compliance with laws under the Department's enforcement authority. However, the Department does not believe that recipients' obligations under multiple civil rights laws requires changing the emergency removal provision in § 106.44(c) because this is an important provision to ensure that recipients have flexibility to balance the need to address emergency situations with fair treatment of a respondent who has not yet been proved responsible for sexual harassment. The Department does not believe that applicable disability laws, or other State laws, render a recipient unable to comply with all relevant legal obligations. For instance, with respect to compulsory education laws, nothing in § 106.44(c) relieves a recipient from complying [964] Section 106.45(b)(1)(iii) requires all Title IX Coordinators (and investigators, decision-makers, and persons who facilitate informal resolution processes) to be free from conflicts of interest or bias against complainants and respondents generally or against an individual complainant or respondent, and requires training for such personnel that includes (among other things) how to serve impartially. A ''respondent'' under § 106.30 means any individual who has been reported to be the perpetrator of conduct that could constitute sexual harassment; thus, a Title IX Coordinator interacting with a respondent undergoing an emergency removal must serve impartially, without conflict of interest or bias.

[965] 28 CFR 35.139(b) (''In determining whether an individual poses a direct threat to the health or safety of others, a public entity must make an individualized assessment, based on reasonable judgment that relies on current medical knowledge or on the best available objective evidence, to ascertain: The nature, duration, and severity of the risk; the probability that the potential injury will actually occur; and whether reasonable modifications of policies, practices, or procedures or the provision of auxiliary aids or services will mitigate the risk.'') (emphasis added).

[966] E.g., 20 U.S.C. 1232g(b)(1)(I) (allowing disclosure, without prior written consent, of personally identifiable information from a student's education records ''subject to regulations of the Secretary, in connection with an emergency, appropriate persons if the knowledge of such information is necessary to protect the health or safety of the student or other persons''); see also regulations implementing FERPA, 34 CFR 99.31(a)(10) and 99.36.

with State laws requiring that students under a certain age receive government-provided education services. As a further example, nothing in § 106.44(c) prevents a recipient from involving a student's IEP team before making an emergency removal decision, and § 106.44(c) does not require a recipient to remove a respondent where the recipient has determined that the threat posed by the respondent, arising from the sexual harassment allegations, is a manifestation of a disability such that the recipient's discretion to remove the respondent is constrained by IDEA requirements.

Changes: We have replaced the phrase ''students or employees'' with the phrase ''any student or other individual'' in § 106.44(c) and removed specification of certain titles of the ADA, instead referencing the whole of the ADA.

Post-Removal Challenges

Comments: Some commenters supported § 106.44(c) giving respondents notice and opportunity to challenge the removal immediately after the removal, because during a removal a respondent might lose a significant amount of instructional time while waiting for a grievance proceeding to conclude, and being out of school can harm the academic success and emotional health of the removed student. Other commenters asserted that respondents should not be excluded from a recipient's education program or activity until conclusion of a grievance process, and a post-removal challenge after the fact is insufficient to assure due process for respondents, especially because § 106.44(c) does not specify requirements for the time frame or procedures used for a challenging the removal decision.

Some commenters argued that the ability of a removed respondent to challenge the removal would pose an unnecessary increased risk to the safety of the community, especially because § 106.44(c) already requires the recipient to determine the removal was justified by an individualized safety and risk analysis. Commenters argued that a school's emergency removal decision should stand until a threat assessment team has met and given a recommendation to affirm or overrule the decision.

Some commenters asserted that § 106.44(c) is ambiguous about the right to a post-removal challenge and argued that the failure to provide more clarity is problematic because it is unclear if the ''immediate'' challenge must occur minutes, hours, one day, or several days after the removal. Commenters argued that a plain language interpretation of ''immediately'' may require the challenge to occur minutes after the suspension, but this could jeopardize the safety of the complainant and the community, because the very point of an interim suspension is to remove a known risk from campus. Other commenters argued that requiring an ''immediate'' post-removal challenge could undermine the respondent's due process rights, because the respondent might not be physically present on campus when the interim suspension (e.g., removal) is issued. Some commenters argued that there should be a delay between when the removal occurred and when the opportunity to challenge occurs, because students and employees are often afraid of providing information to college administrations due to legitimate, reasonable fear for their own safety. Commenters requested that this provision be modified to give the respondent a challenge opportunity ''as soon as reasonably practicable'' rather than ''immediately.'' Commenters asked whether providing a challenge opportunity ''immediately'' must, or could, be the same as the ''prompt'' time frames required under § 106.45.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support of the post-removal challenge opportunity provided in § 106.44(c). The Department disagrees with commenters who suggested that no challenge to removals ought to be possible, and believes that § 106.44(c) appropriately balances the interests involved in emergency situations. We do not believe that prescribing procedures for the post-removal challenge is necessary or desirable, because this provision ensures that respondents receive the essential due process requirements of notice and opportunity to be heard while leaving recipients flexibility to use procedures that a recipient deems most appropriate.[967] These final regulations aim to improve the perception and reality of the fairness and accuracy by which a recipient resolves allegations of sexual harassment, and therefore the § 106.45 grievance process prescribes a consistent framework and specific procedures for resolving formal complaints of sexual harassment. By contrast, § 106.44(c) is not designed to resolve the underlying allegations of sexual harassment against a respondent, but rather to ensure that recipients have the authority and discretion to appropriately handle emergency situations that may arise from allegations of sexual harassment. As discussed above, the final regulations revise the language in § 106.44(c) to add the phrase ''arising from the allegations of sexual harassment,'' which clarifies that the facts or circumstances that justify a removal might not be the same as the sexual harassment allegations but might ''arise from'' those allegations.

The Department disagrees that a post-removal challenge is unnecessary because the individualized safety and risk analysis already determined that removal was justified; the purpose of a true emergency removal is to authorize a recipient to respond to immediate threats even without providing the respondent with pre-deprivation notice and opportunity to be heard because this permits a recipient to protect the one or more persons whose physical health or safety may be in jeopardy. The respondent's first opportunity to challenge the removal (e.g., by presenting the recipient with facts that might contradict the existence of an immediate threat to physical health or safety) might be after the recipient already reached its determination that removal is justified, and due process principles (whether constitutional due process of law, or fundamental fairness) require that the respondent be given notice and opportunity to be heard.[968] Section 106.44(c) does not preclude a recipient from convening a threat assessment team to review the recipient's emergency removal determination, but § 106.44(c) still requires the recipient to give the respondent post-removal notice and opportunity to challenge the removal decision.

The Department expects the emergency removal process to be used in genuine emergency situations, but when it is used, recipients must provide an opportunity for a removed individual to challenge their removal immediately after the removal. The term ''immediately'' will be fact-specific, but is generally understood in the context of a legal process as occurring without delay, as soon as possible, given the circumstances. ''Immediately'' does not require a time frame of ''minutes'' because in the context of a legal proceeding the term immediately is not generally understood to mean an absolute exclusion of any time interval.

[967] E.g., Goss v. Lopez, 419 U.S. 565, 582–83 (1975) (''Students whose presence poses a continuing danger to persons or property or an ongoing threat of disrupting the academic process may be immediately removed from school. In such cases, the necessary notice and rudimentary hearing should follow as soon as practicable'').

[968] Goss, 419 U.S. at 580 (''At the very minimum, therefore, students facing suspension and the consequent interference with a protected property interest must be given some kind of notice and afforded some kind of hearing.'').

''Immediately'' does not imply the same time frame as the ''reasonably prompt'' time frames that govern the grievance process under § 106.45, because ''immediately'' suggests a more pressing, urgent time frame than ''reasonable promptness.'' This is appropriate because § 106.44(c) does not require a recipient to provide the respondent with any pre-deprivation notice or opportunity to be heard, so requiring post-deprivation due process protections ''immediately'' after the deprivation ensures that a respondent's interest in access to education is appropriately balanced against the recipient's interest in quickly addressing an emergency situation posed by a respondent's risk to the physical health or safety of any student or other individual. We decline to require the post-removal notice and challenge to be given ''as soon as reasonably practicable'' instead of ''immediately'' because that would provide the respondent less adequate post-deprivation due process protections.

Changes: None.

No Stated Time Limitation for the Emergency Removal

Comments: Some commenters viewed the absence of a time limitation with respect to how long an emergency removal could be as a source of harm to both respondents and complainants. Commenters asserted that, given how long the grievance process could take, students and employees removed from their education or employment until conclusion of the grievance process could experience considerable negative consequences. Commenters argued that the proposed rules should not encourage emergency removal, particularly not when other, less severe measures could be taken to ensure safety pending an investigation. Commenters proposed limiting an emergency removal to seven days, during which time an institution would determine in writing that an immediate threat to health or safety exists, warranting the emergency action, and if no such determination is reached, the respondent would be reinstated.

Discussion: The final regulations require schools to offer supportive measures to complainants and permit recipients to offer supportive measures to respondents. We decline to require emergency removals in every situation where a formal complaint triggers a grievance process. The grievance process is designed to conclude promptly, and the issue of whether a respondent needs to be removed on an emergency basis should not arise in most cases, since § 106.44(c) applies only where emergency removal is justified by an immediate threat to the physical health or safety of any student or other individual. Revised § 106.44(a), and revised § 106.45(b)(1)(i), prohibit a recipient from imposing against a respondent disciplinary sanctions or other actions that are not supportive measures as defined in § 106.30, without following the § 106.45 grievance process. Emergency removal under § 106.44(c) constitutes an exception to those prohibitions, and should not be undertaken in every situation where sexual harassment has been alleged. Rather, emergency removal is appropriate only when necessary to address imminent threats to a person's physical health or safety arising from the allegations of sexual harassment.

The Department declines to put any temporal limitation on the length of a valid emergency removal, although nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient from periodically assessing whether an immediate threat to physical health or safety is ongoing or has dissipated.

Changes: None.

''Removal''

Comments: Commenters requested clarification in the following regards: Would removing a respondent from a class, or changing the respondent's class schedule, before a grievance process is completed (or where no formal complaint has initiated a grievance process), require a recipient to undertake emergency removal procedures? Under § 106.44(c) must a recipient remove a respondent from the entirety of recipient's education program or activity, or may a recipient choose to only remove the respondent to the extent the individual poses an emergency in a specific setting, i.e., a certain class, student organization, living space, athletic team, etc.?

Commenters argued that the § 106.30 definition of supportive measures and § 106.44(c) regarding emergency removal could lead to confusion among recipients about what steps they can take to protect a complainant's safety and access to education prior to conclusion of a grievance process, or where no formal complaint has initiated a grievance process. One commenter suggested modifying this provision to expressly permit partial exclusion from programs or activities by adding the phrase ''or any part thereof.''

Commenters argued that § 106.44(c) would make it too difficult to remove a respondent before the completion of a disciplinary proceeding absent an extreme emergency. Commenters suggested that the Department should consider a more nuanced approach that provides schools with a range of options, short of emergency removal, that are proportionate to the alleged misconduct and meet the needs of the victim. Commenters requested that § 106.44(c) be revised to allow an appropriate administrator (such as a dean of students), in consultation with the Title IX Coordinator, discretion to determine the appropriateness of an emergency removal based on a standard that is in the best interest of the institution.

Some commenters argued that even where an emergency threat exists, § 106.44(c) does not provide a time frame in which the recipient must make this emergency removal decision, leaving survivors vulnerable to daily contact with a dangerous respondent. Commenters asserted that recipients should be able to remove a respondent from a dorm or shared classes before conclusion of a disciplinary proceeding, particularly when it is clear that the survivor's education will be harmed otherwise. Commenters asserted that 80 percent of rapes and sexual assaults are committed by someone known to the victim,[969] which means that it is highly likely that the victim and perpetrator share a dormitory, a class, or other aspect of the school environment and that § 106.44(c) (combined with the § 106.30 definition of ''supportive measures'') leaves victims in continual contact with their harasser, thereby prioritizing the education of accused harassers over the education of survivors. Commenters argued that survivors should not have to wait until the end of a grievance process to be protected from seeing a perpetrator in class or on campus, and this provision would pressure survivors to file formal complaints when many survivors do not want a formal process for valid personal reasons, because a formal process would be the only avenue for ensuring that a ''guilty'' respondent will be suspended or expelled. Commenters recommended adding language to clarify that nothing shall prevent elementary and secondary schools from implementing an ''alternate assignment'' during the pendency of an investigation, provided that the same is otherwise permitted by law.

One commenter suggested combining the emergency removal and supportive measures provisions into a single ''interim measures'' provision.

Discussion: The Department believes the § 106.30 definition of supportive measures, and § 106.44(c) governing emergency removals, in the context of the revised requirements in § 106.44(a) and § 106.45(b)(1)(i) (requiring recipients to offer supportive measures to complainants while not imposing against respondents disciplinary sanctions or other actions that are not ''supportive measures'') provide a wide range and variety of options for a recipient to preserve equal educational access, protect the safety of all parties, deter sexual harassment, and respond to emergency situations.

Under § 106.30, a supportive measure must not be punitive or disciplinary, but may burden a respondent as long as the burden is not unreasonable. As discussed in the ''Supportive Measures'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble, whether a certain measure unreasonably burdens a respondent requires a fact-specific inquiry. Changing a respondent's class schedule or changing a respondent's housing or dining hall assignment may be a permissible supportive measure depending on the circumstances. By contrast, removing a respondent from the entirety of the recipient's education programs and activities, or removing a respondent from one or more of the recipient's education programs or activities (such as removal from a team, club, or extracurricular activity), likely would constitute an unreasonable burden on the respondent or be deemed disciplinary or punitive, and therefore would not likely qualify as a supportive measure. Until or unless the recipient has followed the § 106.45 grievance process (at which point the recipient may impose any disciplinary sanction or other punitive or adverse consequence of the recipient's choice), removals of the respondent from the recipient's education program or activity [970] need to meet the standards for emergency removals under § 106.44(c).[971] Supportive measures provide one avenue for recipients to protect the safety of parties and permissibly may affect and even burden the respondent, so long as the burden is not unreasonable. Supportive measures may include, for example, mutual or unilateral restrictions on contact between parties or re-arranging class schedules or classroom seating assignments, so complainants need not remain in constant or daily contact with a respondent while an investigation is pending, or even where no grievance process is pending.

Whether an elementary and secondary school recipient may implement an ''alternate assignment'' during the pendency of an investigation (or without a grievance process pending), in circumstances that do not justify an emergency removal, when such action is otherwise permitted by law, depends on whether the alternate assignment constitutes a disciplinary or punitive action or unreasonably burdens the respondent (in which case it would not qualify as a supportive measure as defined in § 106.30).[972] Whether an action ''unreasonably burdens'' a respondent is fact-specific, but should be evaluated in light of the nature and purpose of the benefits, opportunities, programs and activities, of the recipient in which the respondent is participating, and the extent to which an action taken as a supportive measure would result in the respondent forgoing benefits, opportunities, programs, or activities in which the respondent has been participating. An alternate assignment may, of course, be appropriate when an immediate threat justifies an emergency removal of the respondent because under the final regulations, emergency removal may justify total removal from the recipient's education program or activity, so offering the respondent alternate assignment is included within the potential scope of an emergency removal. Under § 106.44(a), the recipient must offer supportive measures to the complainant, and if a particular action—such as alternate assignment—does not, under specific circumstances, meet the definition of a supportive measure, then the recipient must carefully consider other individualized services, reasonably available, designed to restore or preserve the complainant's equal educational access and/or protect safety and deter sexual harassment, that the recipient will offer to the complainant.

We do not believe that the final regulations incentivize complainants to file formal complaints when they otherwise do not wish to do so just to avoid contacting or communicating with a respondent, because supportive measures permit a range of actions that are non-punitive, non-disciplinary, and do not unreasonably burden a respondent, such that a recipient often may implement supportive measures that do meet a complainant's desire to avoid contact with the respondent. For example, if a complainant and respondent are both members of the same athletic team, a carefully crafted unilateral no-contact order could restrict a respondent from communicating directly with the complainant so that even when the parties practice on the same field together or attend the same team functions together, the respondent is not permitted to directly communicate with the complainant. Further, the recipient may counsel the respondent about the recipient's anti-sexual harassment policy and anti-retaliation policy, and instruct the team coaches, trainers, and staff to monitor the respondent, to help enforce the no-contact order and deter any sexual harassment or retaliation by the respondent against the complainant. Further, nothing in the final regulations, or in the definition of supportive measures in § 106.30, precludes a recipient from altering the nature of supportive measures provided, if circumstances change. For example, if the Title IX Coordinator initially implements a supportive measure prohibiting the respondent from directly communicating with the complainant, but the parties later each independently decide to take the same lab class, the Title IX Coordinator may, at the complainant's request, reevaluate the circumstances and offer the complainant additional supportive measures, such as requiring the professor teaching the lab class to ensure that the complainant and respondent are not ''teamed up'' or assigned to sit near each other or assigned as to be ''partners,'' during or as part of the lab class.

Commenters correctly observe that the final regulations prohibit suspending or [970] As discussed in the ''Section 106.44(a) 'education program or activity' '' subsection of the ''Section 106.44 Recipient's Response to Sexual Harassment, Generally'' section of this preamble, the Title IX statute and existing regulations provide definitions of ''program or activity'' that apply to interpretation of a recipient's ''education program or activity'' in these final regulations, and we have clarified in § 106.44(a) that for purposes of responding to sexual harassment a recipient's education program or activity includes circumstances over which the recipient exercised substantial control. 20 U.S.C. 1687; 34 CFR 106.2(h); 34 CFR 106.2(i) (defining ''recipient''); 34 CFR 106.31(a) (referring to ''any academic, extracurricular, research, occupational training, or other education program or activity operated by a recipient which receives Federal financial assistance'').

[971] Cf. § 106.44(d) (a non-student employee-respondent may be placed on administrative leave (with or without pay) while a § 106.45 grievance process is pending, without needing to meet the emergency removal standards in § 106.44(c)).

[972] For discussion of alternate assignments when the respondent is a non-student employee, see the ''Section 106.44(d) Administrative Leave'' subsection of the ''Additional Rules Governing Recipients' Responses to Sexual Harassment'' subsection of the ''Section 106.44 Recipient's Response to Sexual Harassment, Generally'' section of this preamble.

expelling a respondent without first following the § 106.45 grievance process, or unless an emergency situation justices removal from the recipient's education program or activity (which removal may, or may not, be labeled a ''suspension'' or ''expulsion'' by the recipient). We do not believe this constitutes unfairness to survivors, or poses a threat to survivors' equal educational access, because there are many actions that meet the definition of supportive measures that may restore or preserve a complainant's equal access, protect a complainant's safety, and/or deter sexual harassment without punishing or unreasonably burdening a respondent. As discussed in the ''Section 106.45(b)(1)(iv) Presumption of Non-Responsibility'' subsection of the ''General Requirements for § 106.45 Grievance Process'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble, refraining from treating people accused of wrongdoing as responsible for the wrongdoing prior to evidence proving the person is responsible is a fundamental tenet of American justice. These final regulations appropriately ensure that respondents are not unfairly, prematurely treated as responsible before being proved responsible, with certain reasonable exceptions: Emergency removals, administrative leave for employees, and informal resolution of a formal complaint that resolves the allegations without a full investigation and adjudication but may result in consequences for a respondent including suspension or expulsion. In this way, the final regulations ensure that every complainant is offered supportive measures designed to preserve their equal educational access and protect their safety (even without any proof of the merits of the complainant's allegations) consistent with due process protections and fundamental fairness. As an example, a complainant understandably may desire as a supportive measure the ability to avoid being in the same classroom with a respondent, whether or not the complainant wants to file a formal complaint. A school may conclude that transferring the respondent to a different section of that class (e.g., that meets on a different day or different time than the class section in which the complainant and respondent are enrolled) is a reasonably available supportive measure that preserves the complainant's equal access and protects the complainant's safety or deters sexual harassment, while not constituting an unreasonable burden on the respondent (because the respondent is still able to take that same class and earn the same credits toward graduation, for instance). If, on the other hand, that class in which both parties are enrolled does not have alternative sections that meet at different times, and precluding the respondent from completing that class would delay the respondent's progression toward graduation, then the school may determinate that requiring the respondent to drop that class would constitute an unreasonable burden on the respondent and would not quality as a supportive measure, although granting the complainant an approved withdrawal from that class with permission to take the class in the future, would of course constitute a permissible supportive measure for the recipient to offer the complainant. Alternatively in such a circumstance (where the complainant, like the respondent, cannot withdraw from that class and take it later without delaying progress toward graduation), the school may offer the complainant as a supportive measure, for example, a one-way no contact order that prohibits the respondent from communicating with the complainant and assigns the respondent to sit across the classroom from the complainant. As such an example shows, these final regulations allow, and require, a recipient to carefully consider the specific facts and circumstances unique to each situation to craft supportive measures to help a complainant without prematurely penalizing a respondent.

The Department does not believe it is necessary or appropriate to require a time frame for when a recipient must undertake an emergency removal, because the risk arising from the sexual harassment allegations that may justify a removal may arise at any time; further, § 106.44(a) requires a recipient to respond ''promptly'' to sexual harassment, and if an emergency removal is a necessary part of a recipient's non-deliberately indifferent response then such a response must be prompt. We reiterate that emergency removal is not about reaching factual conclusions about whether the respondent is responsible for the underlying sexual harassment allegations. Emergency removal is about determining whether an immediate threat arising out of the sexual harassment allegations justifies removal of the respondent.

We appreciate the opportunity to clarify that, where the standards for emergency removal are met under § 106.44(c), the recipient has discretion whether to remove the respondent from all the recipient's education programs and activities, or to narrow the removal to certain classes, teams, clubs, organizations, or activities. We decline to add the phrase ''or any part thereof'' to this provision because a ''part of'' a program may not be readily understood, and we believe the authority to exclude entirely includes the lesser authority to exclude partially.

Section 106.44(a) and § 106.45(b)(1)(i) forbid a recipient from imposing disciplinary sanctions (or other actions that are not supportive measures) on a respondent without first following a grievance process that complies with § 106.45. We reiterate that a § 106.44(c) emergency removal may be appropriate whether or not a grievance process is underway, and that the purpose of an emergency removal is to protect the physical health or safety of any student or other individual to whom the respondent poses an immediate threat, arising from allegations of sexual harassment, not to impose an interim suspension or expulsion on a respondent, or penalize a respondent by suspending the respondent from, for instance, playing on a sports team or holding a student government position, while a grievance process is pending. The final regulations respect complainants' autonomy and understand that not every complainant wishes to participate in a grievance process, but a complainant's choice not to file a formal complaint or not to participate in a grievance process does not permit a recipient to bypass a grievance process and suspend or expel (or otherwise discipline, penalize, or unreasonably burden) a respondent accused of sexual harassment. An emergency removal under § 106.44(c) separates a respondent from educational opportunities and benefits, and is permissible only when the high threshold of an immediate threat to a person's physical health or safety justifies the removal.

Because the purposes of, and conditions for, ''supportive measures'' as defined in § 106.30 differ from the purposes of, and conditions for, an emergency removal under § 106.44(c), we decline to combine these provisions. Both provisions, and the final regulations as a whole, do not prioritize the educational needs of a respondent over a complainant, or vice versa, but aim to ensure that complainants receive a prompt, supportive response from a recipient, respondents are treated fairly, and recipients retain latitude to address emergency situations that may arise.

''Individualized Safety and Risk Analysis''

Comments: Many commenters argued that the lack of guidance in § 106.44(c) on the requirements for conducting the ''individualized safety and risk analysis'' is confusing, and should be better defined because it could lead to inconsistent results from school to school, county to county, and State to State. Some commenters expressed overall support for this provision, but argued that the power of removal should not be wielded without careful consideration, and requested clarity about who would undertake the risk analysis (e.g., an internal or external individual on behalf of a recipient). Other commenters stated that § 106.44(c) should list factors to consider in the required safety and risk analysis including: whether violence was alleged (which commenters asserted is rare in cases involving alleged incapacitation), how long the complainant took to file a complaint, whether the complainant has reported the allegations to the police, and whether there are other, less restrictive measures that could be taken. Commenters argued that the risk assessment requirement may prevent the removal of respondents who are in fact dangerous because context and other nuances may not be accounted for in the assessment. One commenter stated that the § 106.44(c) safety and risk analysis requirements are ''good, but sometimes not realistic'' because threat assessment teams do not meet daily, and it is sometimes necessary to decide a removal in a matter of hours. Other commenters stated some recipients have already incorporated this sort of threat assessment into their decision matrix because postsecondary institutions are obligated to take reasonable steps to address dangers or threats to their students.

Some commenters were concerned that institutions lack sufficient resources to properly conduct the required safety and risk analysis, that institutions lack the proper tools to conduct assessments calibrated to the age and developmental issues of the respondent, and that institutions lack the training and knowledge to properly implement such assessments. Commenters asserted that this provision would require institutions to train employees to conduct an individualized safety and risk analysis before removing students on an emergency basis, but that such assessments are rarely within the capacity or expertise of a single employee, and thus may require a committee or task force dedicated for this purpose.

Discussion: Recipients are entitled to use § 106.44(c) to remove a respondent on an emergency basis, only where there is an immediate threat to the physical health or safety of any student or other individual. The ''individualized safety or risk analysis'' requirement ensures that the recipient should not remove a respondent from the recipient's education program or activity pursuant to § 106.44(c) unless there is more than a generalized, hypothetical, or speculative belief that the respondent may pose a risk to someone's physical health or safety. The Department believes that the immediate threat to physical health or safety threshold for justifying a removal sufficiently restricts § 106.44(c) to permitting only emergency removals and believes that further describing what might constitute an emergency would undermine the purpose of this provision, which is to set a high threshold for emergency removal yet ensure that the provision will apply to the variety of circumstances that could present such an emergency. The Department also believes that the final regulations adequately protect respondents, since in cases where the recipient removes a respondent, the recipient must follow appropriate procedures, including bearing the burden of demonstrating that the removal meets the threshold specified by the final regulations, based on a factual, individualized safety and risk analysis. We understand commenters' concerns that the individualized, fact-based nature of an emergency removal assessment may lead to different results from school to school or State to State, but different results may be reasonable based on the unique circumstances presented in individual situations.

Because the safety and risk analysis under § 106.44(c) must be ''individualized,'' the analysis cannot be based on general assumptions about sex, or research that purports to profile characteristics of sex offense perpetrators, or statistical data about the frequency or infrequency of false or unfounded sexual misconduct allegations. The safety and risk analysis must be individualized with respect to the particular respondent and must examine the circumstances ''arising from the allegations of sexual harassment'' giving rise to an immediate threat to a person's physical health or safety. These circumstances may include factors such as whether violence was allegedly involved in the conduct constituting sexual harassment, but could also include circumstances that ''arise from'' the allegations yet do not constitute the alleged conduct itself; for example, a respondent could pose an immediate threat of physical self-harm in reaction to being accused of sexual harassment. For a respondent to be removed on an emergency basis, the school must determine that an immediate threat exists, and that the threat justifies removal. Section 106.44(c) does not limit the factors that a recipient may consider in reaching that determination.

We appreciate commenters' concerns that performing safety and risk analyses may require a recipient to expend resources or train employees, but without an individualized safety and risk analysis a recipient's decision to remove a respondent might be arbitrary, and would fail to apprise the respondent of the basis for the recipient's removal decision so that the respondent has an opportunity to challenge the decision. Procedural due process of law and fundamental fairness require that a respondent deprived of an educational benefit be given notice and opportunity to contest the deprivation;[973] without knowing the individualized reasons why a recipient determined that the respondent posed a threat to someone's physical health or safety, the respondent cannot assess a basis for challenging the recipient's removal decision. Recipients may choose to provide specialized training to employees or convene interdisciplinary threat assessment teams, or be required to take such actions under other laws, and § 106.44(c) leaves recipients flexibility to decide how to conduct an individualized safety and risk analysis, as well as who will conduct the analysis.

''Provides the Respondent With Notice and an Opportunity To Challenge the Decision Immediately Following the Removal''

Comments: One commenter stated that during any emergency removal hearing, schools should be required to share all available evidence with the respondent, permit that person an opportunity to be heard, and allow the respondent's advisor to cross-examine any witnesses. According to the commenter, if these full procedural rights are not extended, this provision would create a loophole that allows emergency measures to effectively replace a full grievance process. Commenters also argued that a recipient's emergency removal decisions would often be hastily made, and that recipients would ignore requirements that a removed student be given the opportunity to review or challenge the decision made by the recipient. Commenters argued that § 106.44(c) should include express language safeguarding students against abusive practices during the challenge procedure. One commenter suggested adding the word ''meaningful'' so the respondent would have ''a meaningful opportunity'' to challenge the removal decision, asserting that certain institutions of higher education in California have not consistently given respondents meaningful opportunities to ''make their case.'' While supportive of § 106.44(c), one commenter suggested modifying this provision to require the recipient to send the respondent written notice of the specific facts that supported the recipient's decision to remove the student, so the respondent can meaningfully challenge the removal decision.

Some commenters asserted that if the respondent has a right to challenge the emergency removal, the recipient must offer an equitable opportunity for the complainant to contest an overturned removal or participate in the respondent's challenge process. Other commenters asked whether § 106.44(c) requires, or allows, a recipient to notify the complainant that a respondent has been removed under this provision, that a respondent is challenging a removal decision, or that a removal decision has been overturned by the recipient after a respondent's challenge.

Commenters argued that § 106.44(c) would also effectively mandate that an institution's employees must be trained to conduct hearings or other undefined post-removal procedures in the event that a respondent exercises the right to challenge the emergency removal. Commenters argued that this burden likely would require a dedicated officer or committee to carry out procedural obligations that did not previously exist, and these burdens were not contemplated at the time of the recipient's acceptance of the Federal funding. Commenters argued that § 106.44(c) would provide rights to at-will employees that are otherwise unavailable, restricting employment actions that are normally within the discretion of an employer.

Commenters requested clarification about the procedures for challenging a removal decision, such as: Whether a respondent's opportunity challenge the emergency removal means the recipient must, or may, use processes under § 106.45 to meet its obligations, including whether evidence must be gathered, witnesses must be interviewed, or a live hearing with cross-examination must be held; whether the recipient, or respondent, will bear the burden of proof that the removal decision was correct or incorrect; whether the recipient must, or may, involve the complainant in the challenge procedure; whether the recipient must, or may, use the investigators and decision-makers that have been trained pursuant to § 106.45 to conduct the post-removal challenge procedure; and whether the determinations about an emergency removal must, or may, influence a determination regarding responsibility during a grievance process under § 106.45.

Discussion: The Department disagrees that § 106.44(c) poses a possible loophole through which recipients may bypass giving respondents the due process protections in the § 106.45 grievance process. The threshold for an emergency removal under § 106.44(c) is adequately high to prevent recipients from using emergency removal as a pretense for imposing interim suspensions and expulsions. We do not believe it is necessary to revise § 106.44(c) to prevent recipients from imposing ''abusive'' procedures on respondents; recipients will be held accountable for reaching removal decisions under the standards of § 106.44(c), giving recipients adequate incentive to give respondents the immediate notice and challenge opportunity following a removal decision. We do not believe that recipients will make emergency removal decisions ''hastily,'' and a respondent who believes a recipient has violated these final regulations may file a complaint with OCR.

The Department does not want to prescribe more than minimal requirements on recipients for purposes of responding to emergency situations. We decline to require written notice to the respondent because minimal due process requires some kind of notice, and compliance with a notice requirement suffices for a recipient's handling of an emergency situation.[974] We decline to add the modifier ''meaningful'' before ''opportunity'' because the basic due process requirement of an opportunity to be heard entails an opportunity that is appropriate under the circumstances, which ensures a meaningful opportunity.[975] While a recipient has discretion (subject to FERPA and other laws restricting the nonconsensual disclosure of personally identifiable information from education records) to notify the complainant of removal decisions regarding a respondent, or post-removal challenges by a respondent, we do not require the complainant to receive notice under § 106.44(c) because not every emergency removal directly relates to the complainant. As discussed above, circumstances that justify removal must be ''arising from the allegations of sexual harassment'' yet may consist of a threat to the physical health or safety of a person other than the complainant (for example, where the respondent has threatened self-harm).[976]

The Department disagrees that § 106.44(c) requires a recipient to go through excessively burdensome procedures prior to removing a respondent on an emergency basis. The seriousness of the consequence of a recipient's decision to removal of a student or employee, without a hearing beforehand, naturally requires the school to meet a high threshold (i.e., an individualized safety and risk assessment shows that the respondent poses an immediate threat to a person's physical health or safety justifying removal). At the same time, § 106.44(c) leaves recipients wide latitude to select the procedures for giving notice and opportunity to challenge a removal.

A recipient owes a general duty under § 106.44(a) to respond to sexual harassment in a manner that is not deliberately indifferent. Where removing an individual on an emergency basis is necessary to avoid acting with deliberate indifference, a recipient must meet the requirements in § 106.44(c). The Department disagrees that § 106.44(c) imposes requirements on recipients that violate the Spending Clause, because recipients understand that compliance with Title IX will [974] E.g., Goss, 419 U.S. at 578–79 (holding that in the public school context ''the interpretation and application of the Due Process Clause are intensely practical matters'' that require at a minimum notice and ''opportunity for hearing appropriate to the nature of the case'') (internal quotation marks and citations omitted).

[975] Id.

[976] As discussed in the ''Section 106.6(e) FERPA'' subsection of the ''Clarifying Amendments to Existing Regulations'' section of this preamble, the complainant has a right to know the nature of any disciplinary sanctions imposed on a respondent after the recipient has found the respondent to be responsible for sexual harassment alleged by the complainant, because the disciplinary sanctions are directly related to the allegations made by the complainant. By contrast, emergency removal of a respondent does not involve a recipient's determination that the respondent committed sexual harassment as alleged by the complainant, and information about the emergency removal is not necessarily directly related to the complainant. Thus, FERPA (or other privacy laws) may restrict a recipient's discretion to disclose information relating to the emergency removal.

require dedication of personnel, time, and resources.[977] Because this provision does not prescribe specific post-removal challenge procedures, we do not believe recipients face significant burdens in training personnel to comply with new or unknown requirements; this provision ensures that the essential features of due process of law, or fundamental fairness, are provided to the respondent (i.e., notice and opportunity to be heard), and we believe that recipients are already familiar with these basic requirements of due process (for public institutions) or fair process (for private institutions).

In response to commenters' clarification requests, the post-removal procedure may, but need not, utilize some or all the procedures prescribed in § 106.45, such as providing for collection and presentation of evidence. Nothing in § 106.44(c) or the final regulations precludes a recipient from placing the burden of proof on the respondent to show that the removal decision was incorrect. Section 106.44(c) does not preclude a recipient from using Title IX personnel trained under § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to make the emergency removal decision or conduct a post-removal challenge proceeding, but if involvement with the emergency removal process results in bias or conflict of interest for or against the complainant or respondent, § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) would preclude such personnel from serving in those roles during a grievance process.[978] Facts and evidence relied on during an emergency removal decision and post-removal challenge procedure may be relevant in a § 106.45 grievance process against the respondent but would need to meet the requirements in § 106.45; for example, a witness who provided information to a postsecondary institution recipient for use in reaching an emergency removal decision would need to appear and be cross-examined at a live hearing under § 106.45(b)(6)(i) in order for the witness's statement to be relied on by the decision-maker.

Changes: None.

How OCR Will Enforce the Provision

Comments: Commenters requested clarification about how OCR would enforce § 106.44(c), including what standard OCR would use in deciding whether a removal was proper; whether OCR would only find a violation if the recipient violates § 106.44(c) with deliberate indifference; whether violating this provision constitutes a violation of Title IX; whether OCR would defer to the determination reached by the recipient even if OCR would have reached a different determination based on the independent weighing of the evidence; whether a harmless error standard would apply to OCR's evaluation of a proper removal decision and only require reversing the recipient's removal decision if OCR thinks the outcome was affected by a recipient's violation of § 106.44(c); and whether OCR, or the recipient, would bear the burden of showing the correctness or incorrectness of the removal decision or the burden of showing that any violation affected the outcome or not.

Discussion: OCR will enforce this provision fully and consistently with other enforcement practices. OCR will not apply a harmless error standard to violations of Title IX, and will fulfill its role to ensure compliance with Title IX and these final regulations regardless of whether a recipient's non-compliance is the result of the recipient's deliberate indifference or other level of intentionality. Recipients whose removal decisions fail to comply with § 106.44(c) may be found by OCR to be in violation of these final regulations. As discussed above, a recipient may need to undertake an emergency removal under § 106.44(c) in order to meet its duty not to be deliberately indifferent to sexual harassment. However, OCR will not second guess the decisions made under a recipient's exercise of discretion so long as those decisions comply with the terms of § 106.44(c). For example, OCR may assess whether a recipient's failure to undertake an individualized risk assessment was deliberately indifferent under § 106.44(a), but OCR will not second guess a recipient's removal decision based on whether OCR would have weighed the evidence of risk differently from how the recipient weighed such evidence. While not every regulatory requirement purports to represent a definition of sex discrimination, Title IX regulations are designed to make it more likely that a recipient does not violate Title IX's non-discrimination mandate, and the Department will vigorously enforce Title IX and these final regulations.

Changes: None.

Section 106.44(d) Administrative Leave

Comments: Some commenters expressed support for § 106.44(d), asserting that this provision appropriately recognizes that cases involving employees as respondents, especially faculty or administrative staff, should have different frameworks than cases involving students.

Some commenters asserted that it is unclear what standard a recipient must satisfy before it may place an employee on administrative leave. Commenters recommended giving discretion to an elementary and secondary school recipient to implement an alternate assignment (such as administrative reassignment to home) for staff during the pendency of an investigation, provided the same is otherwise permitted by law.

Commenters wondered how the Department defines ''administrative leave,'' whether § 106.44(d) applies to paid or unpaid leave, and whether that would depend on how existing recipient employee conduct codes or employment contracts address the issue of paid or unpaid leave. Commenters asked whether an employee-respondent placed on leave may collect back pay from the recipient, if the grievance process determines there was insufficient evidence of misconduct. One commenter argued that administrative leave must include pay and benefits, as well as lodging if the employee-respondent resided in campus housing.

One commenter asserted that treating non-student employees differently than students or student-employees under § 106.44(d) constitutes discrimination. Another commenter questioned why recipients can deny employees paychecks for months until the conclusion of a formal grievance process, but give immediate due process for students to challenge an emergency removal; the commenter asserted that the recipient could simply provide a free semester of college to cover any loss to a student yet the proposed rules do not require a recipient to give back pay to an employee. Some commenters argued that § 106.44(c) emergency removal requirements to undertake an individualized safety and risk analysis and provide notice and an opportunity to challenge should also apply to administrative leave so that employees receive the same due process protections as students. Commenters argued that school investigations can take several months and that being on leave, especially without pay, can be a severe hardship for many employees. Commenters asserted that the Department should explicitly require recipients to secure a removed employee's personal property and be responsible for any damage occurring to [977] See discussion under the ''Spending Clause'' subsection of the ''Miscellaneous'' section of this preamble.

[978] Section 106.45(b)(1)(iii) requires all Title IX Coordinators, investigators, decision-makers, and persons who facilitate an informal resolution to be free from bias or conflicts of interest for or against complainants or respondents generally, or for or against any individual complainant or respondent.

the property before the removed employee can regain custody.

Commenters asserted that § 106.44(d) should apply to student-employee respondents and should be revised to limit the provision to administrative leave ''from the person's employment,'' so that a student-employee respondent could still have access to the recipient's educational programs but the recipient would not be forced to continue an active employment relationship with that respondent during the investigation. For example, commenters argued, a recipient should not be compelled to allow a teaching assistant who has been accused of sexual harassment to continue teaching while the accusations are being investigated.

Commenters argued that § 106.44(d) should reference disability laws that protect employees parallel to the references to disability laws in § 106.44(c).

Discussion: The Department appreciates the support from commenters for § 106.44(d), giving a recipient discretion to place respondents who are employees on administrative leave during the pendency of an investigation.

We acknowledge commenters' concerns that § 106.44(d) does not specify conditions justifying administrative leave; however, we desire to give recipients flexibility to decide when administrative leave is appropriate. If State law allows or requires a school district to place an accused employee on ''reassignment to home'' or alternative assignment, § 106.44(d) does not preclude such action while an investigation under § 106.45 into sexual harassment allegations against the employee is pending.

The Department does not define ''administrative leave'' in this provision, but administrative leave is generally understood as temporary separation from a person's job, often with pay and benefits intact. However, these final regulations do not dictate whether administrative leave during the pendency of an investigation under § 106.45 must be with pay (or benefits) or without pay (or benefits). With respect to the terms of administrative leave, recipients who owe obligations to employees under State laws or contractual arrangements may comply with those obligations without violating § 106.44(d). Similarly, these final regulations do not require back pay to an employee when the pending investigation results in a determination that the employee was not responsible. Further, this provision does not require a recipient to cover the costs of lodging for, or to secure the personal property of, an employee placed on administrative leave, although the final regulations do not preclude a recipient from taking such actions. We note that these final regulations similarly allow—but do not require—a recipient to repay a respondent for expenses incurred as a result of an emergency removal or to take actions to secure personal property during a removal under § 106.44(c) (whether the removed respondent was a student, or an employee). We also note that § 106.6(f) provides that nothing in this part may be read in derogation of an individual's rights, including an employee's rights, under Title VII [979] and that other laws such as Title VII may dictate whether administrative leave should be paid or unpaid and whether a respondent should be repaid for expenses incurred as a result of any of the recipient's actions.

The Department acknowledges that being placed on administrative leave—especially if the leave is without pay—may constitute a hardship for the employee. However, no respondent who is an employee may be kept on administrative leave indefinitely, because § 106.44(d) does not authorize administrative leave unless a § 106.45 grievance process has been initiated, and § 106.45(b)(1)(v) requires the grievance process to be concluded within a designated reasonably prompt time frame. As proposed in the NPRM, § 106.44(d) provided that a recipient may place a non-student employee respondent on administrative leave during the pendency of an investigation; this was intended to refer to an investigation conducted pursuant to the § 106.45 grievance process. To clarify this point, the Department replaces ''an investigation'' with ''a grievance process that complies with § 106.45'' in § 106.44(d) to make it clear that a recipient may place a non-student employee respondent on administrative leave during the pendency of a grievance process that complies with § 106.45. The Department also revised § 106.44(d) to provide that ''nothing in this subpart'' instead of ''nothing in this section'' precludes a recipient from placing a non-student employee respondent on administrative leave to clarify that § 106.44(d) applies to subpart D of Part 106 of Title 34 of the Code of Federal Regulations. This revision makes it clear that nothing in subpart D of Part 106 of Title, which concerns nondiscrimination on the basis of sex in education programs or activities receiving Federal financial assistance and which includes other provisions such as § 106.44 and § 106.45, precludes a recipient from placing a non-student employee respondent on administrative leave during the pendency of a grievance process that complies with § 106.45.

The Department appreciates commenters' suggestions that the same due process protections (notice and opportunity to challenge a removal) that apply to respondents under § 106.44(c) should apply to an employee placed on administrative leave under § 106.44(d). This is unnecessary, because § 106.44(c) applies to an emergency removal of any respondent. Any respondent (whether an employee, a student, or other person) who poses an immediate threat to the health or safety of any student or other individual may be removed from the recipient's education program or activity on an emergency basis, where an individualized safety and risk analysis justifies the removal. Thus, respondents who are employees receive the same due process protections with respect to emergency removals (i.e., post-removal notice and opportunity to challenge the removal) as respondents who are students.

The Department also clarifies that pursuant to § 106.44(d), a recipient may place a non-student employee respondent on administrative leave, even if the emergency removal provision in § 106.44(c) does not apply. With respect to student-employee respondents, we explain more fully, below, that these final regulations do not necessarily prohibit a recipient from placing a student-employee respondent on administrative leave if doing so does not violate other regulatory provisions. For example, placing a student-employee respondent on administrative leave with pay may be permissible as a supportive measure, defined in § 106.30, for a complainant (for instance, to maintain the complainant's equal educational access and/or to protect the complainant's safety or deter sexual harassment) as long as that action meets the conditions that a supportive measure is not punitive, disciplinary, or unreasonably burdensome to the respondent. Whether a recipient considers placing a student-employee respondent on administrative leave as part of a non-deliberately indifferent response under § 106.44(a) is a decision that the Department will evaluate based on whether such a response is clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances. The Department will interpret these final regulations in a manner that complements an employer's obligations under Title VII, and nothing in these final regulations or in Part 106 of Title 34 of the Code of Federal Regulations may be read in derogation of any individual's rights, including any employee's rights, under Title VII, as explained in more detail in the ''Section 106.6(f) Title VII and Directed Question 3 (Application to Employees)'' subsection of the ''Clarifying Amendments to Existing Regulations'' section of this preamble.

Section 106.44(a) prohibits a recipient from imposing disciplinary sanctions against a respondent without following a grievance process that complies with § 106.45. Administrative leave without pay is generally considered disciplinary, and would likely be prohibited under § 106.44(a) in the absence of the § 106.44(d) administrative leave provision. The Department believes that while an investigation is pending, a recipient should have discretion to place an employee-respondent on any form of administrative leave the recipient deems appropriate, so that the recipient has flexibility to protect students from exposure to a potentially sexually abusive employee. Numerous commenters asserted that educator sexual misconduct is prevalent throughout elementary and secondary schools, and postsecondary institutions.[980] For these reasons, the final regulations permit, but do not require, what may amount to an interim suspension of an employee-respondent (i.e., administrative leave without pay) even though the final regulations prohibit interim suspensions of student-respondents. We reiterate that any respondent may be removed on an emergency basis under § 106.44(c).

We do not believe that employees placed on administrative leave are denied sufficient due process under these circumstances, because in order for § 106.44(d) to apply, a § 106.45 grievance process must be underway, and that grievance process provides the respondent (and complainant) with clear, strong procedural protections designed to reach accurate outcomes, including the right to conclusion of the grievance process within the recipient's designated, reasonably prompt time frame. As previously explained, the Department revised § 106.44(d) to clarify that a recipient may place a non-student respondent on administrative leave during the pendency of a grievance process that complies with § 106.45.

Commenters erroneously asserted that because § 106.44(d) applies only to ''non-student employees,'' a recipient is always precluded from placing an employee-respondent on administrative leave if the employee is also a student. We decline to make § 106.44(d) apply to student-employees or to change this provision to specify that administrative leave is ''from the person's employment.'' Consistent with § 106.6(f), where an employee is not a student, we do not preclude a recipient-employer from placing a non-student employee on administrative leave during the pendency of a grievance process that complies with § 106.45. These final regulations do not prohibit a recipient from placing a student-employee respondent on administrative leave if doing so does not violate other regulatory provisions. As discussed above, placing a student-employee respondent on administrative leave with pay may be permissible as a supportive measure, defined in § 106.30, and may be considered by the recipient as part of the recipient's obligation to respond in a non-deliberately indifferent manner under § 106.44(a). Where a student is also employed by their school, college, or university, it is likely that the student depends on that employment in order to pay tuition, or that the employment is important to the student's academic opportunities. Administrative leave may jeopardize a student-employee's access to educational benefits and opportunities in a way that a non-student employee's access to education is not jeopardized. Accordingly, administrative leave is not always appropriate for student-employees. There may be circumstances that justify administrative leave with pay for student-employees, and the specific facts of a particular matter will dictate whether a recipient's response in placing a student-employee on administrative leave is permissible. For example, if a student-employee respondent works at a school cafeteria where the complainant usually eats, a recipient may determine that placing the student-employee respondent on administrative leave with pay, during the pendency of a grievance process that complies with § 106.45, will not unreasonably burden the student-employee respondent, or the recipient may determine that re-assigning the student-employee respondent to a different position during pendency of a § 106.45 grievance process, will not unreasonably burden the student-employee respondent. If a recipient places a party who is a student-employee on administrative leave with pay as a supportive measure, then such administrative leave must be non-disciplinary, non-punitive, not unreasonably burdensome, and otherwise satisfy the definition of supportive measures in § 106.30. With respect to a student-employee respondent, a recipient also may choose to take measures other than administrative leave that could constitute supportive measures for a complainant, designed to protect safety or deter sexual harassment without unreasonably burdening the respondent. For example, where an employee is also a recipient's student, it is likely that the recipient has the ability to supervise the student-employee to ensure that any continued contact between the student-employee respondent and other students occurs under monitored or supervised conditions (e.g., where the respondent is a teaching assistant), during the pendency of an investigation. If a recipient removes a respondent pursuant to § 106.44(c) after conducting an individualized safety and risk analysis and determining that an immediate threat to the physical health or safety of any students or other individuals justifies removal, then a recipient also may remove a student-employee respondent from any employment opportunity that is part of the recipient's education program or activity.

The Department is persuaded by commenters who asserted that analogous disability protections should expressly apply for employee-respondents under § 106.44(d) as for respondents under the § 106.44(c) emergency removal provision. We have revised § 106.44(d) of the final regulations to state that this provision may not be construed to modify any rights under Section 504 or the ADA.

Changes: We have revised § 106.44(d) to clarify that it will not be construed to modify Section 504 or the ADA.[981] We also revised § 106.44(d) to clarify that nothing in subpart D of Part 106, Title 34 of the Code of Regulations, precludes

Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints

General Requirements for § 106.45 Grievance Process

Section 106.45(a) Treatment of Complainants or Respondents Can Violate Title IX

Comments: Commenters including students, professors, campus administrators, and attorneys, expressed appreciation and support for § 106.45(a). Some commenters asserted that § 106.45(a) is a welcome addition because in recent years, Federal judges have expressed concerns about how university treatment of respondents (or complainants) might run afoul of Title IX and contradict Title IX's promise of gender equity. Some commenters noted that although Federal courts have not assumed that all unfair procedures depriving respondents of a fair process necessarily equate to sex discrimination,[982] numerous Federal courts have identified plausible claims of an institutions' sex discrimination against respondents, and commenters cited Federal cases [983] where courts noted sex discrimination may exist where an institution failed to investigate evidence that the complainant might also have committed sexual misconduct in the same case, credited only female witnesses, ignored exonerating evidence because of preconceived notions about how males and females behave, used gender-biased training materials that portray only men as sexual predators or only women as victims, or denied the respondent necessary statistical information to test allegations of gender bias.

Other commenters gave examples of how they have observed sex-driven unfair treatment against respondents in campus Title IX proceedings. A few commenters pointed out that when a sexual harassment grievance process favors females over males in an attempt to be equitable to victims, the result is often that male victims of sexual harassment are not treated equitably; some commenters cited to statistics showing that similar percentages of men (5.3 percent) and women (5.6 percent) experience sexual violence other than rape each year,[984] that about 14 percent of reported rape cases involve men or boys, one in six reported sexual assaults is against a boy, one in 25 reported sexual assaults is against a man,[985] and that a survey of 27 colleges and universities revealed that 40.9 percent of undergraduate heterosexual males had experienced sexual harassment, intimate partner violence, or stalking, compared to 60.5 percent of undergraduate heterosexual females.[986] Some commenters opined that the Department's withdrawn 2011 Dear Colleague Letter contributed to more instances of universities applying grievance procedures in a sex-discriminatory manner (usually against respondents, who, commenters argued, are overwhelmingly male). At least one commenter supportive of § 106.45(a) cited a white paper by NCHERM cautioning colleges and universities to avoid applying grievance procedures in an unfair, biased manner (whether favoring complainants, or favoring the accused) and urging institutions to have balanced processes.[987] Several commenters, including attorneys and organizations with experience representing accused students, supported § 106.45(a) because although the provision only clarifies what is already the intent of the law, the provision is necessary to counter institutional bias in favor of female accusers and against male accused students, as both are entitled to equally fair procedures untainted by gender bias; one such commenter referred to § 106.45(a) as an ''essential corrective'' to gender bias that permeates campus sexual misconduct proceedings, and another believed that the provision will encourage schools to be more careful in how they treat both sides.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support for § 106.45(a) and acknowledges that many commenters have observed through personal experiences navigating campus sexual misconduct proceedings that some recipients have applied grievance procedures in a manner that shows discrimination against respondents on the basis of sex. We note that other commenters have recounted personal experiences navigating campus sexual misconduct proceedings perceived to be biased against complainants on the basis of sex. To the extent that such discriminatory practices occur, § 106.45(a) advises recipients against sex discriminatory practices during the grievance process and to avoid different treatment favoring or disfavoring any party on the basis of sex. However, to clarify that § 106.45(a) applies as much to complainants as to respondents, the final regulations revise the language in this provision but retain the provision's statement that how a recipient treats a complainant, or a respondent, ''may'' constitute sex discrimination under Title IX. The Department emphasizes that any person regardless of sex may be a victim or perpetrator of sexual harassment and that different treatment due to sex-based stereotypes about how men or women behave with respect to sexual violence violates Title IX's non-discrimination mandate.

Changes: The final regulations revise § 106.45(a) to state more clearly that treatment of a complainant or respondent may constitute sex discrimination in violation of Title IX.

Comments: Some commenters opposed § 106.45(a), claiming that this provision would harbor perpetrators by permitting them to claim a Title IX violation even if the recipient merely opens an investigation into their conduct, and would revictimize and retraumatize survivors. Some commenters argued that this provision operates from a premise of false equivalency since the respondent is not involved in the process on the basis of their sex but rather on the basis of their alleged behavior whereas the complainant alleges to have suffered Title IX sexual harassment (discrimination on the basis of sex). Some commenters argued that a recipient's treatment of the respondent does not constitute discrimination on the basis of sex under Title IX unless sex bias was a factor and therefore the Department lacks authority to issue a regulation that equates unfair treatment of a respondent with sex discrimination. Other commenters contended that Title IX [988] does not include the grievance process prescribed in these final regulations and does not address the conduct of school officials implementing a grievance process, and that the Department has no authority to create new individual rights under Title IX. At least one commenter argued that the purpose of § 106.45(a) appears to be justifying the entirety of the Department's prescribed grievance process (which the commenter argued is characterized by rape exceptionalism with many provisions designed to benefit only respondents) by wrongfully characterizing procedural protections for respondents as needed to avoid sex discrimination. Another commenter argued that § 106.45(a) turns Title IX on its head by making respondents accused of sexual harassment into a protected class, enabling respondents to make a sex discrimination claim for any deviation from the § 106.45 grievance process requirements while complainants would need to show deliberate indifference to claim sex discrimination.

Some commenters asserted that this provision hamstrings recipients excessively and that the provision is fundamentally unfair to survivors. Some commenters argued that the provision grants respondents the right to sue for sex discrimination under Title IX and contended that fear of respondent litigation causes recipients to deprive complainants of due process and fair procedures by, for example, giving respondents access to information or accommodations not given to the complainant or to deliberately mislead the complainant about the investigation. One commenter characterized § 106.45(a) as giving an ''unsubstantiated right of action for respondents under Title IX'' that will cause ''risk-averse universities to fail to investigate properly, and that schools and university legal counsel will be incentivized to never find in a survivor's favor, even when the facts clearly indicate that sexual violence occurred,'' leading to more complainants suing recipients privately under Title IX just to force institutions to treat complainants equally. This concern was echoed by a few commenters who argued that this provision would cause institutions to ignore reports and refuse to punish perpetrators for fear of respondent lawsuits.

Other commenters characterized § 106.45(a) as purporting to consider the treatment of the respondent as equally violating Title IX as the alleged behavior (sexual violence) prompting the Title IX case in the first place, while another commenter believed this provision meant that unfair treatment of a respondent constituted sexual harassment. A few commenters argued that § 106.45(a) unnecessarily risks incentivizing institutions to treat survivors unfairly, because respondents already have legal theories (such as violation of due process and breach of contract) with which to challenge unfair discipline, and Federal courts [989] have appropriately made it difficult for respondents to successfully challenge unfair discipline as sex discrimination, either on an erroneous outcome or selective enforcement theory—a result that would be undermined by § 106.45(a) giving respondents new rights to pursue unfair discipline claims under the auspices of Title IX.

One commenter, a Title IX Coordinator, stated that § 106.45(a) seems unnecessary because typically both parties are members of the recipient's community and the recipient should not discriminate against any member of its community. One commenter opposed § 106.45(a) because it tells male students they have been victimized and gives male students more incentive to gratify themselves at the expense of a woman's education. One commenter argued that if stating that a recipient's treatment of a party in sexual harassment proceedings ''may'' constitute sex discrimination is sufficient to justify the Department regulating extensive grievance procedures in sexual harassment cases, there is no end to the Department's authority, on the same reasoning, to regulate any other type of interaction between a school and its students or employees, since any action taken by a recipient ''may'' constitute sex discrimination.

Some commenters suggested modifications in language including to specify that a recipient's response to a complaint may constitute sex discrimination where: The recipient deprives a respondent of access to education based on sex stereotypes or by using procedures that discriminate on the basis of sex; the recipient acts with deliberate indifference; by a reasonable and objective standard, the ''treatment'' is sufficiently severe or pervasive so as to interfere with a student's educational opportunities and/or create a hostile work environment; there is evidence of discriminatory application of Title IX or acts of retaliation; the recipient uses investigatory or other acts to mistreat (or not adequately treat well) the respondent. Another commenter asserted that § 106.45(a) should specify that programs funded by the U.S. Department of Justice's Office on Violence Against Women (OVW) must comply with these final regulations. Another commenter argued that § 106.45 should consider that when in doubt, the recipient may err on side of releasing information in order to avoid liability under these final regulations.

Discussion: The Department disagrees with commenters who believed that § 106.45(a) would harbor perpetrators and revictimize or retraumatize survivors by permitting respondents to claim a Title IX violation based on a recipient's opening of an investigation into alleged sexual harassment. This provision does not declare that actions toward a respondent (or complainant) do constitute sex discrimination in violation of Title IX, but states only that treatment of a respondent (or treatment of a complainant) may constitute sex discrimination. Title IX prohibits sex discrimination against all individuals on the basis of the protected characteristic (sex), and § 106.45(a) advises recipients to be aware that taking action with respect to either party in a grievance process resolving allegations of sexual harassment may not be done in a sex discriminatory manner. This provision operates to protect complainants and respondents equally, irrespective of sex, by emphasizing to recipients that although a grievance process takes place in the context of resolving allegations of one type of sex discrimination (sexual harassment), a recipient must take care not to treat a party differently on the basis of the party's sex because to do so would inject further sex discrimination into the situation. For example, a recipient's decision to investigate sexual harassment complaints brought by women but not by men may constitute sex discrimination in the context of a sexual harassment grievance process; similarly, a recipient's practice of imposing a sanction of expulsion on female respondents found responsible for sexual harassment, but suspension on male respondents found responsible, may constitute sex discrimination.

The Department acknowledges that the text of the Title IX statute does not specify grievance procedures for resolving allegations of sexual harassment. However, at the time Title IX was enacted in 1972, Federal courts had not yet addressed sexual harassment as a form of sex discrimination, but the Supreme Court's Gebser/Davis framework explicitly interpreted Title IX's non-discrimination mandate to include sexual harassment as a form of sex discrimination. Since 1975 the Department's Title IX regulations have required recipients to adopt and publish ''grievance procedures'' for the prompt and equitable resolution of complaints that recipients are committing sex discrimination against students or employees.[990] The Department's authority to enforce such regulations has been acknowledged by the Supreme Court.[991] The Department has determined that current regulatory reference to ''grievance procedures'' that are ''prompt and equitable'' does not adequately prescribe a consistent, fair, reliable grievance process for resolving allegations of Title IX sexual harassment; in accordance with the Department's regulatory authority under Title IX, the final regulations now set forth a grievance process for resolving formal complaints raising allegations of sexual harassment.

The Department disagrees that § 106.45(a) turns Title IX on its head or creates a new protected class (respondents); this provision focuses on the central purpose of Title IX, to provide protections from sex-discriminatory practices to all persons, acknowledging that the ways in which complainants and respondents are treated must not be affected by the sex of a person even though the underlying allegations involve allegations of a type of sex discrimination (sexual harassment) that make it tempting for recipients to intentionally or unintentionally allow sex-based biases, stereotypes, and generalizations to influence how procedures are applied. Partly in response to commenters' misapprehension that § 106.45(a) allows respondents—but not complainants—to claim sex discrimination whenever a requirement in § 106.45 is not met, the final regulations permit either party equally to appeal a determination regarding responsibility on the basis of procedural irregularity.[992] Similarly, either party believing a recipient failed to follow the § 106.45 grievance process could file a complaint with OCR that could result in the Department requiring the recipient to come into compliance with § 106.45, regardless of whether the violation of § 106.45 also amounted to deliberate indifference (as to a complainant) or otherwise constituted sex discrimination (as to a respondent). A violation of § 106.45 need not, and might not necessarily, constitute sex discrimination, whether the violation disfavored a complainant or a respondent. Thus, § 106.45(a) does not create a special protection for respondents or special burden for complainants with respect to allegations that a recipient failed to comply with the § 106.45 grievance process.

For similar reasons, the Department disagrees that § 106.45(a) in any way ''hamstrings'' recipients into catering to respondents' interests or permits recipients to ignore complainants or treat complainants unfavorably out of fear of being sued by respondents. Rather, § 106.45(a) reminds recipients that Title IX requires recipients to avoid bias, prejudice, or stereotypes based on sex whether the recipient's intent is to favor or disfavor complainants or respondents. As to commenters' concerns that out of fear of respondent lawsuits recipients will, for example, give respondents access to information or accommodations not given to the complainant or deliberately mislead the complainant about the investigation, the Department notes that such actions likely will either violate specific provisions of § 106.45 (e.g., § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) requires the parties to have equal opportunity to inspect and review evidence) or constitute the very treatment against a complainant that § 106.45(a) cautions against. For reasons discussed in the ''General Support and Opposition for the § 106.45 Grievance Process'' section of this preamble, the Department disputes that the § 106.45 grievance process is premised on rape exceptionalism. The prescribed grievance process is tailored to resolve allegations of sexual harassment that constitute sex discrimination under a Federal civil rights law, not to adjudicate criminal charges; the fact that resolution of sexual harassment under Title IX requires, in the Department's judgment, a consistent, predictable grievance process in no way implies that a ''special'' process is needed due to rape myths or sex-based generalizations (such as, ''women lie about rape''). The § 106.45 grievance process does not prioritize respondent's rights over those of complainants. Rather, § 106.45 contains important procedural protections that apply equally to both parties with three exceptions: One provision that treats complainants and respondents equitably instead of equally (by recognizing a complainant's interest in a recipient providing remedies, and a respondent's interest in disciplinary sanctions imposed only after a recipient follows a fair process);[993] one provision that applies only to respondents (a presumption of non-responsibility until conclusion of a fair process);[994] and one provision that applies only to complainants (protection from questions and evidence regarding sexual history).[995]

The Department is aware that in private lawsuits brought under Title IX, Federal courts have been reluctant to equate unfair treatment of a respondent during a sexual misconduct disciplinary proceeding with sex discrimination unless the respondent can show that the unfair treatment was motivated by the party's sex. Contrary to commenters' assertions, § 106.45(a) does not assume that any unfair treatment constitutes sex discrimination, but does caution recipients that treatment of any party could constitute sex discrimination. In this way, § 106.45(a) shields parties (both complainants and respondents) from recipient actions during the grievance process that are impermissibly motivated by sex-based bias or stereotypes in violation of Title IX's non-discrimination mandate. However, as discussed above, this does not mean that every violation of § 106.45 necessarily equates to sex discrimination. The Department disagrees that § 106.45(a) purports to consider treatment of a respondent during a grievance process as the same type of behavior that prompted the respondent to become a respondent in the first place (e.g., alleged sexual misconduct), or that this provision equates unfair discipline with sexual harassment. The Department appreciates the opportunity to clarify that when a respondent is treated differently based on sex during a grievance process designed to resolve allegations that the respondent perpetrated sexual harassment, the sex-based treatment of the respondent violates Title IX's non-discrimination mandate in a different way than sexual harassment does when sexual harassment constitutes sex discrimination under Title IX. Title IX prohibits different treatment on the basis of sex, which § 106.45(a) acknowledges may occur against respondents or complainants in violation of Title IX. Title IX also requires recipients to respond appropriately to allegations of sexual harassment, because sexual harassment constitutes a particular form of sex discrimination. The Department also appreciates the opportunity to clarify that the Department does not draw an equivalency among different types of sex discrimination prohibited under Title IX, and recognizes that when sex discrimination takes the form of sexual harassment victims often face trauma and negative impacts unique to that particular form of sex discrimination; indeed, it is this recognition that has prompted the Department to promulgate legally binding regulations governing recipients' response to sexual harassment rather than continuing to rely on guidance documents that lack the force and effect of law.

The Department disagrees with commenters who argued that § 106.45(a) is unnecessary because respondents already have non-Title IX legal theories on which to challenge unfair discipline and have erroneous outcome and selective enforcement theories with which to challenge unfair discipline under Title IX. While it is true that respondents have relied on such theories to pursue private lawsuits, similarly complainants already have a judicially implied private right of action under Title IX to sue a recipient for being deliberately indifferent to a complainant victimized by sexual harassment. The existence of private rights of action under Title IX, or under other laws, does not obviate the importance of the Department using its statutory authorization to effectuate the purposes of Title IX through administrative enforcement by promulgating regulations designed to provide individuals with effective protections against discriminatory practices. Indeed, in the final regulations some requirements intended to protect against sex discrimination apply only to the benefit of complainants (e.g., § 106.44(a) has been revised to require as part of a non-deliberately indifferent response that recipients notify complainants of the availability of supportive measures with or without the filing of a formal complaint, offer supportive measures to the complainant, and explain to complainants the process for filing a formal complaint) while other provisions aim to ensure protections against sex discrimination for both complainants and respondents (e.g., § 106.45(a)). The Department has administrative authority to enforce such provisions, whether or not Federal courts would impose the same requirements under a complainant's or respondent's private Title IX lawsuit.

The Department agrees with the commenter who asserted that recipients should not discriminate against any member of the recipient's community but maintains that § 106.45(a) is not rendered unnecessary by that belief. The Department disagrees that § 106.45(a) conveys to male students that being treated unfairly in the grievance process gives license to perpetrate sexual misconduct against women; while a recipient must treat a respondent in a manner free from sex discrimination and impose discipline only after following a fair grievance process, those restrictions in no way encourage or incentivize perpetration of sexual misconduct and in fact help ensure that sexual misconduct, where reliably determined to have occurred, is addressed through remedies for victims and disciplinary sanctions for perpetrators.

The Department understands the commenter's concern that § 106.45(a) could be misunderstood to justify the Department regulating any facet of a recipient's interaction with students and employees because in any circumstance a recipient ''may'' act in a sex-biased manner. The Department appreciates the opportunity to clarify that § 106.45(a) is necessary in the context of sexual harassment because allegations of such conduct present an inherent risk of sex-based biases, stereotypes, and generalizations permeating the way parties are treated, such that a consistent, fair process applied without sex bias to any party is needed.

The Department's authority to promulgate regulations under Title IX encompasses regulations to effectuate the purpose of Title IX, and as commenters acknowledged, one of the two main purposes of Title IX is providing individuals with protections against discriminatory practices.[996] Implementation of a grievance process for resolution of sexual harassment lies within the Department's statutory authority to regulate under Title IX,[997] and § 106.45(a) is a provision designed to protect all individuals involved in a sexual harassment situation from sex discriminatory practices in the context of a grievance process to resolve formal complaints of sexual harassment. Thus, § 106.45, and paragraph (a) in particular, does not create new individual rights but rather prescribes procedures designed to protect the rights granted all persons under Title IX to be free from sex discrimination with respect to participation in education programs or activities.

The Department notes that nothing about § 106.45(a) creates or grants respondents (or complainants) rights to file private lawsuits, whether under Title IX or otherwise. Title IX does not contain an express private right of action, but the Supreme Court has judicially implied such a right.[998] In Gebser, the Supreme Court declined to allow petitioner to seek damages in a private suit under Title IX for the school's alleged failure to have a grievance procedure as required under Department regulations because ''failure to promulgate a grievance procedure does not itself constitute 'discrimination' under Title IX.'' [999] The Court continued, ''Of course, the Department of Education could enforce the requirement administratively: Agencies generally have authority to promulgate and enforce requirements that effectuate the statute's non-discrimination mandate, 20 U.S.C. 1682, even if those requirements do not purport to represent a definition of discrimination under the statute.'' [1000] Thus, the Department's exercise of administrative enforcement authority does not grant new rights to respondents (or complainants) who pursue remedies against recipients in private lawsuits under Title IX.

The Department appreciates commenters' suggestions for modifications to this provision, but declines to add modifiers or qualifiers that would further describe how and when a recipient's treatment of a complainant or respondent might constitute sex discrimination. In the interest of retaining the broad intent of Title IX's non-discrimination mandate, § 106.45(a) in the final regulations begins the entirety of a Title IX sexual harassment grievance process under § 106.45 by advising recipients to avoid treatment of any party in a manner that discriminates on the basis of sex. The § 106.45 grievance process leaves recipients with significant discretion to adopt procedures that are not required or prohibited by § 106.45, including, for example, rules designed to conduct hearings in an orderly manner respectful to all parties. Section 106.45(a) emphasizes to recipients that such rules or practices that a recipient chooses to adopt must be applied without different treatment on the basis of sex. To reinforce the importance of treating complainants and respondents equally in a grievance process, the final regulations also revise the introductory sentence of § 106.45(b) to indicate that any grievance process rules a recipient chooses to adopt (that are not already required under § 106.45) must treat the parties equally. Together with § 106.45(a), this modification emphasizes, for the benefit of any person involved in a Title IX grievance process, that recipients must treat both parties equally and without regard to sex.

The Department declines to specify what programs (including those funded by OVW grants) must comply with this provision; questions about application of Title IX to individual recipients may be submitted to the recipient's Title IX Coordinator, the Assistant Secretary, or both, under § 106.8(b)(1). The Department disagrees with the commenter who suggested that § 106.45(a) will cause a recipient to err on the side of releasing information or increase a recipient's fear of retaliation; however, in response to many comments concerning confidentiality and retaliation, the final regulations include § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation and specifying that the recipient must keep confidential the identity of any individual who has made a report or complaint of sex discrimination, including any individual who has made a report or filed a formal complaint of sexual harassment, any complainant, any individual who has been reported to be the perpetrator of sex discrimination, any respondent, and any witness, except as may be permitted by FERPA, required by law, or as necessary to conduct the grievance process, and providing that complaints alleging retaliation may be filed according to the prompt and equitable grievance procedures for sex discrimination that recipients must adopt under § 106.8(c).

Changes: We are adding § 106.71, prohibiting retaliation and specifying that the recipient must keep confidential the identity of any individual who has made a report or complaint of sex discrimination, including any individual who has made a report or filed a formal complaint of sexual harassment, any complainant, any individual who has been reported to be the perpetrator of sex discrimination, any respondent, and any witness, except as may be permitted by the FERPA statute or regulations, 20 U.S.C. 1232g and 34 CFR part 99, or required by law, or to carry out the purposes of 34 CFR part 106, and providing that complaints alleging retaliation may be filed according to the grievance procedures for sex discrimination that recipients must adopt under § 106.8(c). We are revising § 106.45(b)(8) regarding appeals, to expressly permit both parties equally to appeal a determination regarding responsibility on the basis of procedural irregularity. We are revising the introductory sentence of § 106.45(b) to state that any rules a recipient chooses to adopt (that are not required under § 106.45) must apply equally to both parties.

Section 106.45(b)(1)(i) Equitable Treatment of Complainants and Respondents

Comments: Many commenters expressed support for § 106.45(b)(1)(i). Some commenters asserted that this provision rectifies sex discrimination against males that has occurred in recipients' Title IX campus proceedings.[1001] Other commenters stated that this provision advances Title IX's goal of due process-type fundamental fairness to both complainants and respondents alike by balancing the scales. One commenter supported this provision because, in the commenter's view, too many institutions view allegations as ''self-proving.'' At least one commenter approved of this provision as being consistent with existing § 106.8 requiring ''prompt and equitable'' resolution of sex discrimination complaints. Another commenter asserted that § 106.45(b)(1)(i) is consistent with our Nation's fundamental values that persons accused of serious misconduct should receive notice and a fair hearing before unbiased decision makers, and a presumption of innocence. Another commenter supported this provision because everyone on campus benefits from fundamentally fair proceedings. One commenter called this provision a ''welcome change'' because, in the commenter's view, accused students at institutions of higher education have had a difficult time restoring their reputations after the institution removes the accused student before a fair determination of the truth of the allegations.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support for this provision. The Department agrees that a fair process benefits both parties, and recipients, by leading to reliable outcomes and increasing the confidence that parties and the public have regarding Title IX proceedings in schools, colleges, and universities. The Department also agrees with the commenter who noted that this provision is consistent with the principle underlying existing § 106.8 wherein recipients have long been required to have ''prompt and equitable'' grievance procedures for handling sex discrimination complaints. The purpose of § 106.45(b)(1)(i) is to emphasize the importance of treating complainants and respondents equitably in the specific context of Title IX sexual harassment, by drawing a recipient's attention to the need to provide remedies to complainants and avoid punishing respondents prior to conclusion of a fair process. As discussed in the ''Role of Due Process in the Grievance Process'' section of this preamble, the § 106.45 grievance process generally treats both parties equally, and § 106.45(b)(1)(i) is one of the few exceptions to strict equality where equitable treatment of the parties requires recognizing that a complainant's interests differ from those of a respondent with respect to the purpose of the grievance process. This is intended to provide both parties with a fair, truth-seeking process that reasonably takes into account differences between a party's status as a complainant, versus as a respondent. Thus, with respect to remedies and disciplinary sanctions, strictly equal treatment of the parties does not make sense, and to treat the parties equitably, a complainant must be provided with remedies where the outcome shows the complainant to have been victimized by sexual harassment; similarly, a respondent must be sanctioned only after a fair process has determined whether or not the respondent has perpetrated sexual harassment.

Changes: None.

Comments: Some commenters objected to § 106.45(b)(1)(i) on the ground that it reinforces the approach of the overall grievance process that commenters believed requires a complainant to undergo a protracted, often traumatic investigation necessitating continuous interrogation of the complainant, all while forcing the complainant to continue seeing the respondent on campus because the respondent is protected from removal until completion of the grievance process; some of these commenters asserted that this will chill reporting.

[1001] Commenters cited, for example: Jeannie Suk Gersen, The Transformation of Sexual-Harassment Law Will Be Double-Faced, The New Yorker (Dec. 20, 2017); American Association of University Women Educational Foundation, Drawing the Line: Sexual Harassment on Campus (2005).

Some commenters opposed this provision on the ground that it aims to treat victims and perpetrators as equals, which is inappropriate because a victim has suffered harm inflicted by a perpetrator, placing them in inherently unequal positions of power; some of these commenters expressed particular concern that this dynamic perpetuates the status quo where teachers accused of harassing students are believed because of their position of authority.

Some commenters claimed that by being gender-neutral this provision makes campuses and Title IX proceedings an unsafe space for victims and is biased against women because it reflects obsolete and unfounded assumptions about sexual harassment and sexual violence and perpetuates harm against women and vulnerable populations. At least one such commenter urged the Department to instead adopt a feminist model that supports the healing of survivors of gender-based violence, prevents revictimization following assault, and seeks to restore power and control the survivor has lost.[1002]

Discussion: The Department believes that § 106.45(b)(1)(i) reflects the critical way in which that a recipient must, throughout a grievance process, treat the parties equitably. The Department disagrees that the final regulations require complainants to undergo protracted, traumatic investigations or necessarily require complainants to interact with respondents on campus while a process is pending. The final regulations require a recipient to offer supportive measures to a complainant with or without the filing of a formal complaint triggering the grievance process.[1003] The final regulations have removed proposed § 106.44(b)(2) and revised the § 106.30 definition of ''complainant'' such that in combination, those revisions ensure that the final regulations do not require a Title IX Coordinator to initiate a grievance process over the wishes of a complainant, and never require a complainant to become a party or to participate in a grievance process.[1004] In these ways, the final regulations respect the autonomy of survivors to choose whether to participate in a grievance process, while ensuring that regardless of that choice, survivors are entitled to supportive measures. Although supportive measures must be non-punitive and non-disciplinary (to any party) and cannot unreasonably burden the other party,[1005] supportive measures do allow complainants options with respect to changes in class schedules or housing re-assignments even while a grievance process is still pending, or where no formal complaint has initiated a grievance process. Moreover, § 106.44(c) permits a recipient to remove a respondent from the recipient's education program or activity without undergoing a grievance process, where an individualized risk assessment shows the respondent poses a threat to any person's physical health or safety, so long as the respondent is afforded post-removal notice and opportunity to challenge the removal decision. The final regulations thus effectuate the purpose of Title IX to provide protection for complainants, while ensuring that a fair process is used to generate a factually reliable resolution of sexual harassment allegations before a respondent is sanctioned based on such allegations. To clarify that the § 106.30 definition of ''supportive measures'' gives recipients wide latitude to take actions to support a complainant, even while having to refrain from imposing disciplinary sanctions against the respondent, we have added to § 106.45(b)(1)(i) the phrase ''or other actions that are not supportive measures as defined in § 106.30.'' [1006] Even where supportive measures, emergency removal where appropriate, the right of both parties to be accompanied by an advisor of choice,[1007] and other provisions intended to ease the stress of a formal process may result in a complainant finding the process traumatizing,[1008] the Department maintains that allegations of sexual harassment must be resolved accurately in order to ensure that recipients remedy sex discrimination occurring in education programs or activities.

The Department disagrees that treating parties equally throughout the grievance process, and recognizing specific ways in which complainants and respondents must be treated equitably under § 106.45(b)(1)(i), inappropriately attempts to place victims and perpetrators on equal footing without recognizing that victims are suffering from a perpetrator's conduct. The Department recognizes that a variety of power dynamics can affect perpetration and victimization in the sexual violence context, including differences in the sex, age, or positions of authority of the parties. The Department believes that a fair process provides procedural tools to parties that can counteract situations where a power imbalance led to the alleged incident. By providing both parties with strong, clear procedural rights—including the right to an advisor of choice to assist a party in navigating the process—a party perceived as being in a weaker position has the same rights as the party perceived as having greater power (perhaps due to sex, age, or a position of authority over the other party), and the process is more likely to generate accurate determinations about what occurred between the parties.

The Department disagrees with commenters who criticized this provision (and the overall approach of the final regulations) for being gender-neutral. Title IX's non-discrimination mandate benefits ''persons'' without regard to sex.[1009] The Department believes that Title IX's non-discrimination mandate is served by an approach that is neutral with respect to sex. The Department notes that applying a sex-neutral framework does not imply that recipients cannot gain understanding about the dynamics of sexual violence including particular impacts of sexual violence on women or other demographic groups—but such background knowledge and information cannot be applied in a way that injects bias or lack of impartiality into a process designed to resolve particular allegations of sexual harassment. Contrary to some commenters' concerns, sex-neutrality in the grievance process helps prevent the very kind of victim-blaming and rape myths that have improperly affected responses to females, and does so in a manner that also prevents improper injection of sex-bias against males. A sex-neutral approach is also the only approach that appropriately prohibits generalizations about ''women as victims'' and ''men as perpetrators'' from improperly affecting an objective evaluation of the facts surrounding each particular allegation and emphasizes for students and recipients the fact that with respect to sexual harassment, any person can be a victim and any person can be a perpetrator, regardless of sex.

Richards et al., A feminist analysis of campus sexual assault policies: Results from a national sample, 66 Family Relations 1 (2017) (criticizing gender-neutral policy approaches because ''In gender-neutral advocacy, policies and practices are uniformly applied and do not take gender dynamics into consideration, thus increasing the risk of victim-blaming attitudes and adherence to myths about rape and other forms of gendered violence'').

Changes: We have revised § 106.45(b)(1)(i) to include the phrase ''or other actions that are not supportive measures as defined in § 106.30'' in addition to disciplinary sanctions, to describe equitable treatment of a respondent during a grievance process.

Comments: Some commenters characterized this provision as a ''weak'' attempt to restore or preserve a complainant's access to education without sufficiently acknowledging that often, sexual harassment causes a complete or total denial of access for the victim (for example, where a victim drops out of school entirely).[1010] Some commenters viewed this provision's description of remedies for a complainant as too narrow because such remedies must be ''designed to restore or preserve access'' to the recipient's education program or activity. At least one commenter understood the phrase ''designed to restore or preserve access'' to forbid a recipient from imposing a disciplinary sanction on a respondent unless the sanction itself is designed to restore or preserve access to education. At least one commenter suggested adding the word ''equal'' before ''access'' in this provision to align this provision with the ''equal access'' language used in § 106.30 defining sexual harassment. A few commenters urged the Department to add a list of possible remedies for complainants including counseling, supportive services, and training for staff. At least one commenter suggested that remedies for a complainant must actually restore or preserve the complainant's access to education and so proposed deleting ''designed to'' from this provision.

Discussion: The Department believes that § 106.45(b)(1)(i) provides a strong, clear requirement for the benefit of victims of sexual harassment: Where a § 106.45 grievance process results in a determination that the respondent in fact committed sexual harassment against the complainant, the complainant must be given remedies. The Department understands that research shows that sexual harassment victims drop out of school more often than other students, and in an effort to prevent that loss of access to education, this provision mandates that recipients provide remedies. In response to commenters concerned that the description of remedies is too narrow or unclear, the final regulations revise this provision. This provision now uses the phrase ''equal access'' rather than simply ''access,'' in response to commenters who pointed out that ''equal access'' is the phrase used in § 106.30 defining sexual harassment. Further, the final regulations substitute ''determination of responsibility'' for ''finding of responsibility,'' out of caution that this provision's use of ''finding'' instead of ''determination'' (when the latter is used elsewhere throughout the proposed rules) caused a commenter's confusion between remedies for a complainant (which are designed to restore the complainant's equal access to education) versus disciplinary sanctions against a respondent (which are not designed to restore a respondent's access to education). Moreover, the final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(1)(i) to state that remedies may consist of the same individualized services listed illustratively in § 106.30 as ''supportive measures'' but remedies need not meet the limitations of supportive measures (i.e., unlike supportive measures, remedies may in fact burden the respondent, or be punitive or disciplinary in nature). The Department believes that this additional language in the final regulations obviates the need to repeat a non-exhaustive list of possible remedies and gives recipients and complainants additional clarity about the kind of remedies available to help restore or preserve equal educational access for victims of sexual harassment.

The Department declines to remove ''designed to'' from this provision. Sexual harassment can cause severe trauma to victims, and while Title IX obligates a recipient to respond appropriately when students or employees are victimized with measures aimed at ensuring a victim's equal access, the Department does not believe it is reasonable to hold recipients accountable for situations where despite a recipient's reasonably designed and implemented remedies, a victim still suffers loss of access (for example, by dropping out) due to the underlying trauma. We have also added § 106.45(b)(7)(iv) requiring Title IX Coordinators to be responsible for the ''effective implementation'' of remedies to clarify that the burden of effectively implementing the remedies designed to restore or preserve the complainant's equal access to education rests on the recipient and must not fall on the complainant.

The Department acknowledges that the 2001 Guidance discussed corrective action in terms of both remedying effects of the harassment on the victim and measures that end the harassment and prevent its recurrence.[1011] For reasons described in the ''Deliberate Indifference'' subsection of the ''Adoption and Adaption of the Supreme Court's Framework to Address Sexual Harassment'' section of this preamble, the Department believes that remedies designed to restore and preserve equal access to the recipient's education programs or activities is the appropriate focus of these final regulations, and a recipient's selection and implementation of remedies will be evaluated by what is not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances.[1012] The Department is persuaded by the Supreme Court's rationale in Davis that courts (and administrative agencies) should not second guess a school's disciplinary decisions, and the Department desires to avoid creating regulatory rules that effectively dictate particular disciplinary sanctions that obligate recipients to attempt to guarantee that sexual harassment does not recur, instead focusing on whether a recipient is effectively implementing remedies to complainants where respondents are [1010] Many commenters cited: Cecilia Mengo & Beverly M. Black, Violence Victimization on a College Campus: Impact on GPA and School Dropout, 18 Journal of Coll. Student Retention: Research, Theory & Practice 2, 234, 244 (2015), for the proposition that survivors drop out of school at higher rates than non-survivors.

[1011] 2001 Guidance at 10 (stating that where the school has determined that sexual harassed occurred, ''The recipient is, therefore, also responsible for remedying any effects of the harassment on the victim, as well as for ending the harassment and preventing its recurrence.'').

[1012] Recipients must also document their reasons for concluding that the recipient's response to sexual harassment was not deliberately indifferent, under § 106.45(b)(10).

found responsible for sexual harassment.

Changes: The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(1)(i) to use the phrase ''equal access'' instead of ''access,'' substitute ''determination of responsibility'' for ''finding of responsibility,'' and state that remedies may include the same individualized services described in § 106.30 defining ''supportive measures'' but unlike supportive measures, remedies need not avoid burdening the respondent and can be punitive or disciplinary. We have also added § 106.45(b)(7)(iv) requiring Title IX Coordinators to be responsible for the ''effective implementation'' of remedies.

Comments: Some commenters objected to § 106.45(b)(1)(i) for referencing ''due process protections'' owed to respondents, claiming that respondents have no right to due process in campus administrative proceedings, or that courts do not require the specific due process protections that the proposed rules require. Some commenters criticized this provision for referring to due process protections for respondents because the reference implies that due process protections are not important for complainants and thereby discounts and downplays the needs of victims. At least one commenter recommended modifying this provision to specify that equitable treatment of both parties requires due process protections for both parties. Other commenters urged the Department not to use ''due process'' or ''due process protections'' in the final regulations and to instead refer to a ''fair process'' for all parties; similarly, at least one commenter asked for clarification whether by using the phrase ''due process protections'' the Department intended to reference constitutional due process or only those protections set forth in the proposed regulations.

Some commenters contended that § 106.45(b)(1)(i) is contradicted by other provisions in the proposed rules; for example, commenters characterized the § 106.44(c) emergency removal provision as contrary to the requirement for equitable treatment of a respondent in § 106.45(b)(1)(i) because the emergency removal section permits schools to remove respondents without due process protections. Other commenters pointed to the requirement in proposed § 106.44(b)(2) that Title IX Coordinators must file a formal complaint upon receiving multiple reports against the same respondent as inequitable to respondents in contravention of § 106.45(b)(1)(i) because a respondent should not have to undergo a grievance process without a cooperating complainant. Other commenters pointed to the presumption of non-responsibility in § 106.45(b)(1)(iv) as ''inequitable'' to complainants in contradiction with § 106.45(b)(1)(i); other commenters characterized the live hearing and cross-examination requirements of § 106.45(b)(6)(i) as inequitable treatment of complainants.

At least one commenter asked the Department to answer whether being sensitive to the trauma experienced by victims would violate this provision by being inequitable to respondents. At least one commenter requested that as part of treating the parties equitably, this provision should require a Title IX Coordinator to offer, and keep lists available that describe, various off-campus supportive resources available to both complainants and respondents, including resources oriented toward survivors and those oriented toward accused students. One commenter asserted that this provision should include a statement that equitable treatment of a respondent must include remedies for a respondent where a complainant is found to have brought a false allegation.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' varied concerns about use of the phrase ''due process protections'' in § 106.45(b)(1)(i) and perceived tension between this provision and other provisions in the proposed rules. The Department agrees with commenters that ''due process protections'' caused unnecessary confusion about whether the proposed rules intended to reference due process of law under the U.S. Constitution, or only those protections embodied in the proposed rules. In response to such comments, the final regulations replace ''due process protections'' with ''a grievance process that complies with § 106.45'' throughout the final regulations, including in this provision, § 106.45(b)(1)(i). As explained in the ''Role of Due Process in the Grievance Process'' section of this preamble, while the Department believes that the § 106.45 grievance process is consistent with constitutional due process obligations, these final regulations apply to all recipients including private institutions that do not owe constitutional protections to their students and employees, and making this terminology change throughout the final regulations helps clarify that position.

The Department disagrees that § 106.45(b)(1)(i) implies that the protections in the grievance process do not also benefit complainants, or should not be given to complainants. The grievance process is of equal benefit to complainants and respondents and each provision has been selected for the purpose of creating a fair process likely to result in reliable outcomes resolving sexual harassment allegations. The equitable distinction in § 106.45(b)(1)(i) recognizes the significance of remedies for complainants and disciplinary sanctions for respondents, but does not alter the benefit of the § 106.45 grievance process providing procedural rights and protections for both parties.

The Department understands commenters' views that certain other provisions in the final regulations are ''inequitable'' for either complainants or respondents. For reasons explained in this preamble with respect to each particular provision, the Department believes that each provision in the final regulations contributes to effectuating Title IX's non-discrimination mandate while providing a fair process for both parties. Section 106.45(b)(1)(i) was not intended to create a standard of ''equitableness'' under which other provisions of the proposed rules should be measured. In response to commenters' apparent perception that § 106.45(b)(1)(i) created a general equitability requirement that applied to the proposed rules or created conflict between this provision and other parts of the proposed rules, the final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(1)(i) to more clearly express its intent—that equitable treatment of a complainant means providing remedies, and equitable treatment of a respondent means imposing disciplinary sanctions only after following the grievance process.[1013]

Being sensitive to the trauma a complainant may have experienced does not violate § 106.45(b)(1)(i) or any other provision of the grievance process, so long as what the commenter means by ''being sensitive'' does not lead a Title IX Coordinator, investigator, or decision-maker to lose impartiality, prejudge the facts at issue, or demonstrate bias for or against any party.[1014] The Department declines to require recipients to list off-campus supportive resources for complainants, respondents, or both, though the final regulations do not prohibit a recipient from choosing to do this. The Department believes that [1013] The Department notes that similar language is included in the final regulations in § 106.44(a) such that a recipient's response in the absence of a formal complaint must treat complainants equitably by offering supportive measures and must treat respondents equitably by imposing sanctions only after following a grievance process that complies with § 106.45.

[1014] Section 106.45(b)(1)(iii).

§ 106.45(b)(1)(ix), requiring recipients to describe the range of supportive measures available to complainants and respondents, is sufficient to serve the Department's interest in ensuring that parties are aware of the availability of supportive measures. The Department declines to require remedies for respondents in situations where a complainant is found to have brought a false allegation. These final regulations are focused on sexual harassment allegations, including remedies for victims of sexual harassment, and not on remedies for other kinds of misconduct.[1015]

Changes: Section 106.45(b)(1)(i) is revised by replacing ''due process protections'' with ''a grievance process that complies with § 106.45'' and by stating that treating complainants equitably means providing remedies where a respondent has been determined to be responsible, and treating respondents equitably means imposing disciplinary sanctions or other actions that are not supportive measures as defined in § 106.30 only after following the § 106.45 grievance process.

Section 106.45(b)(1)(ii) Objective Evaluation of All Relevant Evidence

Comments: Numerous commenters supported § 106.45(b)(1)(ii) asserting that it ensures fairness, accuracy, due process, and impartiality to all parties. Several commenters shared personal experiences with Title IX investigations in which they witnessed the recipient ignoring, discounting, burying, or destroying exculpatory evidence. Similarly, other commenters stated that they have observed inculpatory evidence being ignored or discounted particularly when a respondent is a star athlete or otherwise prominent within the recipient's educational community.

Other commenters expressed concerns about requiring an objective evaluation of relevant evidence. Some commenters asserted that it would be challenging to get such evidence in sexual assault cases, because sexual assault often happens without witnesses who can corroborate stories. One commenter contended that getting objective evidence every time would be a ''near-impossible task,'' while another felt it is ''unrealistic'' to expect tangible evidence in all cases. Some commenters argued that such a high standard would likely chill reporting. One commenter was concerned that an objective evaluation of all relevant evidence could lead to respondents extending investigations indefinitely since almost anything could be relevant and new evidence or witnesses might surface regularly.

Some commenters expressed support for this provision's preclusion of making credibility determinations based on party status because it is inappropriate to make presumptions about trustworthiness based on whether a person is a complainant or respondent. Other commenters opposed this part of § 106.45(b)(1)(ii) and suggested modifying the provision to require that credibility determinations not be based ''solely'' on a person's status, but argued that fact-finders could base credibility determinations in part on a person's status as a complainant or respondent. These commenters opposed any categorical bar to the fact-finder's considerations when determining credibility, and questioned whether this provision is in significant tension with the presumption of non-responsibility in § 106.45(b)(1)(iv). Commenters asserted that § 106.45(b)(1)(ii)'s requirement is problematic for adjudicators because it directs them to ignore central factors in credibility determinations, such as what interests a party has at stake. Commenters argued that courts, law enforcement, and other investigators have always considered a party's status as a defendant or plaintiff when determining how to weigh evidence and testimony. Commenters argued that recipients should be permitted to consider a party's status when considering the totality of the circumstances to reach credibility determinations.

A number of commenters proposed modifications related to training that commenters believed would improve implementation of this provision and promote objectivity and competence, such as training about applying rules of evidence, how to collect and evaluate evidence, and how to determine if evidence is credible, relevant, or reliable.

Many commenters suggested types of evidence that should be considered, specific investigative processes, or other evidentiary requirements. Commenters proposed, for example, that the final regulations should require consideration of letters, videos, photos, emails, texts, phone calls, social media, mental health history, drug, alcohol, and medication use, and rape kits. Commenters also proposed requiring a variety of investigative techniques, including asking the Department to require recipients to take immediate action to collect and test all evidence, including permitting recipients to interview community members and other witnesses (e.g., roommates, dorm residents, classmates, fraternity members). Commenters also asked whether the recipient may consider evidence of the respondent's lack of credibility, other bad acts, and misrepresentation of key facts. Some commenters asked whether the proposed rules would allow respondents to introduce lie detector test results and impact statements. Some commenters wanted the final regulations to require investigators to identify any data gaps in investigative report noting unavailable information (e.g., unable to interview eyewitnesses or to visit the scene of an incident) and all attempts to fill those data gaps, as well as requiring hearing boards to explain the specific evidentiary basis for each finding. Other commenters asserted that the final regulations should require all evidence to be shared with the parties to ensure fairness, and that an investigator should not get to decide what is relevant.

Commenters requested that the Department clarify how to evaluate whether evidence is relevant. Commenters asked how recipients should make credibility determinations, and whether it would be permissible to admit character and reputation evidence, including past sexual history or testimony based on hearsay. One commenter asserted that requiring an ''objective evaluation'' leaves questions about what this term will mean in practice, noting that similar provisions in the VAWA negotiated rulemaking in 2012 raised concerns that the subjectivity (at least in defining bias) would be an overreach into campus administrative decisions.

Some commenters suggested specific modifications to the wording of the proposed provision. For example, individual commenters suggested that the Department: Replace ''objective'' with ''impartial' for consistency with VAWA; add language emphasizing that the recipient's determination must be unbiased since recipient bias has been a significant problem in Title IX investigations; add that objective evaluation be ''based on rules of evidence under applicable State law;'' add that schools shall resolve doubts ''in favor of considering evidence to be relevant and exculpatory'' to address the danger that recipients will narrowly construe what constitutes exculpatory evidence; and add that unsubstantiated theories of trauma cannot be relied on to conclude that a particular complainant suffered from trauma or be used to explain away a complainant's inconsistencies. One commenter asserted that underweighting relevant testimony simply because someone is a friend to a party in a case will make it materially harder to prove an assault and will not promote equitable treatment for all parties; this commenter mistakenly believed that the proposed rules used the phrase ''arbiters should underweight character feedback from biased witnesses'' and wanted that language changed.

[1015] The Department notes that the final regulations add § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation, and paragraph (b)(2) of that section cautions recipients that a determination regarding responsibility, alone, is not sufficient to conclude that a party has made a materially false statement in bad faith. The Department leaves recipients with discretion to address false statements (by any party) under the recipient's own code of conduct.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support of this provision and acknowledges other commenters' concerns about § 106.45(b)(1)(ii). While the gathering and evaluation of available evidence will take time and effort on the part of the recipient, the Department views any difficulties associated with the provision's evidence requirement to be outweighed by the due process benefits the provision will bring to both parties during the grievance process. The recipient's investigation and adjudication of the allegations must be based on an objective evaluation of the evidence available in a particular case; the type and extent of evidence available will differ based on the facts of each incident. The Department understands that in some situations, there may be little or no evidence other than the statements of the parties themselves, and this provision applies to those situations. As some commenters have observed, Title IX campus proceedings often involve allegations with competing plausible narratives and no eyewitnesses, and such situations still must be evaluated by objectively evaluating the relevant evidence, regardless of whether that available, relevant evidence consists of the parties' own statements, statements of witnesses, or other evidence. This provision does not require ''objective'' evidence (as in, corroborating evidence); this provision requires that the recipient objectively evaluate the relevant evidence that is available in a particular case. The Department disagrees that this provision could permit endlessly delayed proceedings while parties or the recipient search for ''all'' relevant evidence; § 106.45(b)(1)(v) requires recipients to conclude the grievance process within designated reasonable time frames and thus ''all'' the evidence is tempered by what a thorough investigation effort can gather within a reasonably prompt time frame.

The Department agrees with commenters who noted the inappropriateness of investigators and decision-makers drawing conclusions about credibility based on a party's status as a complainant or respondent. While the Department appreciates the concerns by commenters advocating that the final regulations should permit status-based inferences as to a person's credibility, the Department believes that to do so would invite bias and partiality. To that end, we disagree with commenters who opposed categorical bars on the factors that investigators or decision-makers may consider, and who want to partially judge a person's credibility based on the person's status as a complainant, respondent, or witness. A process that permitted credibility inferences or conclusions to be based on party status would inevitably prejudge the facts at issue rather than determine facts based on the objective evaluation of evidence, and this would decrease the likelihood that the outcome reached would be accurate.

The Department disagrees that § 106.45(b)(1)(ii) conflicts with the presumption of non-responsibility; in fact, § 106.45(b)(1)(ii) helps to ensure that the presumption is not improperly applied by recipients. Section 106.45(b)(1)(iv) affords respondents a presumption of non-responsibility until the conclusion of the grievance process. Section 106.45(b)(1)(ii) applies throughout the grievance process, including with respect to application of the presumption, to ensure that the presumption of non-responsibility is not interpreted to mean that a respondent is considered truthful, or that the respondent's statements are credible or not credible, based on the respondent's status as a respondent. Treating the respondent as not responsible until the conclusion of the grievance process does not mean considering the respondent truthful or credible; rather, that presumption buttresses the requirement that investigators and decision-makers serve impartially without prejudging the facts at issue.[1016] Determinations of credibility, including of the respondent, must be based on objective evaluation of relevant evidence—not on inferences based on party status. Both the presumption of non-responsibility and this provision are designed to promote a fair process by which an impartial fact-finder determines whether the respondent is responsible for perpetrating sexual harassment. Every determination regarding responsibility must be based on evidence, not assumptions about respondents or complainants. The Department disagrees that disregarding party status poses problems for investigators or adjudicators or directs them to ignore central factors in reaching credibility determinations. Title IX personnel are not prevented from understanding and taking into account each party's interests and the ''stakes'' at issue for each party, yet what is at stake does not, by itself, reflect on the party's truthfulness.

In response to commenters' concerns about how to determine ''relevance'' in the context of these final regulations, we have revised § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) specifically to require training on issues of relevance (including application of the ''rape shield'' protections in § 106.45(b)(6)). Thus, these final regulations require Title IX personnel to be well trained in how to conduct a grievance process; within the requirements stated in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) recipients have flexibility to adopt additional training requirements concerning evidence collection or evaluation.

Similarly, the Department declines to adopt commenters' suggestions that the final regulations explicitly allow or disallow certain types of evidence or utilize specific investigative techniques. The Department believes that the final regulations reach the appropriate balance between prescribing sufficiently detailed procedures to foster a consistently applied grievance process, while deferring to recipients to tailor rules that best fit each recipient's unique needs. While the proposed rules do not speak to admissibility of hearsay,[1017] prior bad acts, character evidence, polygraph (lie detector) results, standards for authentication of evidence, or similar issues concerning evidence, the final regulations require recipients to gather and evaluate relevant evidence,[1018] with the understanding that this includes both inculpatory and exculpatory evidence, and the final regulations deem questions and evidence about a complainant's prior sexual behavior to be irrelevant

[1016] For further discussion on the purpose and function of the presumption of non-responsibility, see the ''Section 106.45(b)(1)(iv) Presumption of Non-Responsibility'' subsection of the ''General Requirements for § 106.45 Grievance Process'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble.

[1017] While not addressed to hearsay evidence as such, § 106.45(b)(6)(i), which requires postsecondary institutions to hold live hearings to adjudicate formal complaints of sexual harassment, states that the decision-maker must not rely on the statement of a party or witness who does not submit to cross-examination, resulting in exclusion of statements that remain untested by cross-examination.

[1018] The final regulations do not define relevance, and the ordinary meaning of the word should be understood and applied.

with two exceptions [1019] and preclude use of any information protected by a legally recognized privilege (e.g., attorney-client).[1020] Within these evidentiary parameters recipients retain the flexibility to adopt rules that govern how the recipient's investigator and decision-maker evaluate evidence and conduct the grievance process (so long as such rules apply equally to both parties).[1021] Relevance is the standard that these final regulations require, and any evidentiary rules that a recipient chooses must respect this standard of relevance. For example, a recipient may not adopt a rule excluding relevant evidence because such relevant evidence may be unduly prejudicial, concern prior bad acts, or constitute character evidence. A recipient may adopt rules of order or decorum to forbid badgering a witness, and may fairly deem repetition of the same question to be irrelevant.

The Department disagrees that requiring an ''objective evaluation'' leaves questions about what this will mean in practice; the final regulations contain sufficient clarity concerning objectivity, while leaving recipients discretion to apply the grievance process in a manner that best fits the recipient's needs. Similarly, the Department is not persuaded that the final regulations permit inappropriate subjectivity as to defining bias or constitute overreach into campus administrative proceedings. A commenter raising that concern noted that the same issue was raised during negotiated rulemaking under VAWA; however, the Department believes that these final regulations prohibit bias with adequate specificity (i.e., bias against complainants or respondents generally, or against an individual complainant or respondent) yet reserve adequate flexibility for recipients to apply the prohibition against bias without unduly overreaching into a recipient's internal administrative affairs. To the extent that the commenter was arguing that prohibiting bias is itself an overreach into campus administrative decisions, the Department does not agree. The text of Title IX prohibits recipients from engaging in discrimination on the basis of sex. Biased decision making increases the risk of erroneous outcomes because bias, rather than evidence, dictates the conclusion. Sex-based bias is a specific risk in the context of sexual harassment allegations, where the underlying conduct at issue inherently raises issues related to sex, making these proceedings susceptible to improper sex-based bias that prevents reliable outcomes. Other forms of bias on the part of individuals in charge of investigating and adjudicating allegations also lessen the likelihood that outcomes are reliable and viewed as legitimate; because Title IX's non-discrimination mandate requires that recipients accurately identify (and remedy) sexual harassment occurring in education programs or activities, these final regulations prohibit bias on the part of Title IX personnel (in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii)) and require objective evaluation of evidence (in § 106.45(b)(1)(ii)).

Rather than require recipients to take ''immediate action'' to collect all evidence, the final regulations require the recipient to investigate the allegations in a formal complaint [1022] yet permit recipients flexibility to conduct the investigation, under the constraint that the investigation (and adjudication) must be completed within the recipient's designated, reasonably prompt time frames.[1023]

While the final regulations do not require hearing boards (as opposed to a single individual acting as the decision-maker), the final regulations do not preclude the recipient from using a hearing board to function as a decision-maker, such that more than one individual serves as a decision-maker, each of whom must fulfill the obligations under § 106.45(b)(1)(iii). Whether or not the determination regarding responsibility is made by a single decision-maker or by multiple decision-makers serving as a hearing board, § 106.45(b)(7)(ii) requires that decision-makers lay out the evidentiary basis for conclusions reached in the case, in a written determination regarding responsibility. Prior to the time that a determination regarding responsibility will be reached, § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) requires the recipient to make all evidence directly related to the allegations available to the parties for their inspection and review, and § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) requires that recipients create an investigative report that fairly summarizes all relevant evidence. The final regulations add language in § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) stating that evidence subject to inspection and review must include inculpatory and exculpatory evidence whether obtained from a party or from another source. The Department does not believe it is necessary to require investigators to identify data gaps in the investigative report, because the parties' right to inspect and review evidence, and review and respond to the investigative report, adequately provide opportunity to identify any perceived data gaps and challenge such deficiencies.

The Department disagrees that an investigator should not get to decide what is relevant, and the final regulations give the parties ample opportunity to challenge relevancy determinations. The investigator is obligated to gather evidence directly related to the allegations whether or not the recipient intends to rely on such evidence (for instance, where evidence is directly related to the allegations but the recipient's investigator does not believe the evidence to be credible and thus does not intend to rely on it). The parties may then inspect and review the evidence directly related to the allegations.[1024] The investigator must take into consideration the parties' responses and then determine what evidence is relevant and summarize the relevant evidence in the investigative report.[1025] The parties then have equal opportunity to review the investigative report; if a party disagrees with an investigator's determination about relevance, the party can make that [1019] Section 106.45(b)(6) contains rape shield protections, providing that questions and evidence about the complainant's sexual predisposition or prior sexual behavior are not relevant, unless such questions and evidence about the complainant's prior sexual behavior are offered to prove that someone other than the respondent committed the conduct alleged by the complainant, or if the questions and evidence concern specific incidents of the complainant's prior sexual behavior with respect to the respondent and are offered to prove consent.

[1020] Section 106.45(b)(1)(x) (precluding a recipient from using information or evidence protected by a legally recognized privilege unless the holder of the privilege has waived the privilege).

[1021] Of course, the manner in which a recipient adopted or applied such a rule or practice concerning evaluation of evidence could constitute sex discrimination, a situation that § 106.45(a) cautions recipients against, and the entirety of a recipient's grievance process must be conducted impartially, free from conflicts of interest or bias for or against complainants or respondents. Further, the introductory sentence of § 106.45(b) has been revised in the final regulations to ensure that a recipient's self-selected rules must apply equally to both parties. The Department notes that the universe of evidence given to the parties for inspection and review under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) must consist of all evidence directly related to the allegations; determinations as to whether evidence is ''relevant'' are made when finalizing the investigative report, pursuant to § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) (requiring creation of an investigative report that ''fairly summarizes all relevant evidence''). Only ''relevant'' evidence can be subject to the decision-maker's objective evaluation in reaching a determination, and relevant evidence must be considered, subject to the rape shield and legally recognized privilege exceptions contained in the final regulations. This does not preclude, for instance, a recipient adopting a rule or providing training to a decision-maker regarding how to assign weight to a given type of relevant evidence, so long as such a rule applies equally to both parties.

argument in the party's written response to the investigative report under § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) and to the decision-maker at any hearing held; either way the decision-maker is obligated to objectively evaluate all relevant evidence and the parties have the opportunity to argue about what is relevant (and about the persuasiveness of relevant evidence). The final regulations also provide the parties equal appeal rights including on the ground of procedural irregularity,[1026] which could include a recipient's failure to objectively evaluate all relevant evidence, including inculpatory and exculpatory evidence. Furthermore, § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) requires the recipient's investigator and decision-maker to be well-trained to conduct a grievance process compliant with § 106.45 including determining ''relevance'' within the parameters of the final regulations.

While the Department appreciates commenters' desire for more oversight as to how a recipient defines or ''counts'' exculpatory evidence, based on commenters' observations that recipients have not consistently understood the need to consider exculpatory evidence as relevant, the Department believes that the final regulations adequately address this concern by specifying that relevant evidence must include both inculpatory and exculpatory evidence, ensuring the parties have opportunities to challenge relevance determinations, and requiring Title IX personnel to be trained to serve impartially including specific training for investigators and decision-makers on issues of relevance.

While some commenters wished to alter the wording of the provision in numerous ways, for the reasons explained above the Department believes that § 106.45(b)(1)(ii) appropriately serves the Department's goal of providing clear parameters for evaluation of evidence while leaving flexibility for recipients within those parameters. The Department thus declines to remove the word ''objective,'' require recipients to adopt any jurisdiction's rules of evidence, or add rules or presumptions that would require particular types of evidence to be relevant.

Changes: In the final regulations we add § 106.45(b)(1)(x), precluding the recipient from using evidence that would result in disclosure of information protected by a legally recognized privilege. The final regulations add language in § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) stating that evidence subject to inspection and review must include inculpatory and exculpatory evidence whether obtained from a party or from another source. We have also revised § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to specifically require investigators and decision-makers to receive training on issues of relevance.

Section 106.45(b)(1)(iii) Impartiality and Mandatory Training of Title IX Personnel; Directed Question 4 (Training)

Comments: Many commenters expressed support for § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) and, in response to the NPRM's directed question about training, stated that the training provided for in this provision is adequate. Several commenters believed this provision provides recipients with appropriate flexibility to decide the amount and type of training recipients must provide to individuals involved with Title IX proceedings. At least one commenter, on behalf of a college, noted that the college already provides for investigators free from bias or conflict of interest. Several commenters supported this provision because its prohibition on bias, conflicts of interest, and training materials that rely on sex stereotypes will lead to impartial investigations and adjudications. One commenter asserted that the proposed regulations help reduce bias by ensuring that training programs are fair and neutral and noted that social scientists and legal academics have argued that training programs can help adjudicatory bodies make better decisions.[1027]

Many commenters supported § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) because of personal experiences with Title IX campus proceedings involving perceived bias or conflicts of interest that commenters believed rendered the investigation or adjudication unfair. One commenter supported this provision because the commenter believed it will counteract the ideological propaganda having to do with sex and gender that has been disseminated throughout institutions of higher education. Another commenter believed this provision will help remedy widespread sex bias against male students at colleges and universities. One commenter favored this provision because the topics considered in a Title IX process are sensitive and personal, improper handling of cases can potentially retraumatize survivors or lead to unfair outcomes for both survivors and the accused, and mandatory training should lead to better results for all involved. One commenter analyzed how and why unconscious biases and sex-based stereotypes are pernicious especially in university disciplinary hearings, can constitute Title IX violations, and lead to biased outcomes. This commenter argued that bias can subvert procedural protections, which are necessary to render fair outcomes, and biased adjudicators cannot properly carry out their duties. One commenter supported this provision's restriction against sex stereotyping in training materials for Title IX personnel, arguing that while appropriate training can reduce bias, improper trainings can leave biases unchecked or exacerbate underlying biases. The commenter argued that numerous examples exist showing that recipients' training documents given to adjudicators in university sexual misconduct processes have demonstrated bias especially against respondents, making it impossible for decision-makers to be impartial and unbiased.[1028]

Another commenter supported § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) combined with the other provisions in § 106.45 because while nothing can completely eliminate gender or racial bias from the system, bias can be reduced by expanding the evidence considered by decision-makers, a function served by a full investigation and hearings with cross-examination. The commenter argued that decisions are most biased when they rely on less evidence and more hunches because hunches are easily tainted by subconscious racial or gender

[1028] Commenters asserted that as of 2014, Harvard Law School's disciplinary board training contained slides to this effect and that one Harvard Law School professor stated that these slides were ''100% aimed to convince [adjudicators] to believe complainants, precisely when they seem unreliable and incoherent'' citing to Emily Yoffe, The Bad Science Behind Campus Response to Sexual Assault, The Atlantic (Sept. 8, 2017). bias.[1029] The commenter asserted that the obligation of the law under Title IX is to treat each person as an individual, not as a member of a class subject to prejudgment and prejudice on the basis of sex, and nowhere is the problem of sex bias more pronounced than in the area of perception, prejudgment, and prejudice in the matter of incidences of violence between members of the opposite sex. The commenter supported the Department's proposed rules, including this provision, based on the Department's authority and obligation to issue regulations that end the discrimination based on sex that exists in Title IX programs themselves.[1030]

One commenter supported this provision but noted that the Supreme Court has recognized that as a practical matter it is difficult if not impossible for an adjudicator ''to free himself from the influence'' of circumstances that would give rise to bias, and the private nature of motives ''underscore the need for objective rules'' for determining when an adjudicator is biased.[1031] This commenter asserted recipients thus need to have objective rules for determining bias. A few commenters supporting this provision recommended that the Department, or recipients on their own, establish a clear process or mechanism for reporting conflicts of interest or demanding recusal for bias during the investigative process.

Several commenters supported this provision but urged the Department to make the training materials referred to in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) publicly available because transparency is the most effective means to eradicate the problems with biased Title IX proceedings, which problems are often rooted in biased training materials. These commenters argued that when recipients know that their training materials are subject to scrutiny, recipients will be more careful to ensure that Title IX personnel are being trained to be impartial. One commenter asserted that a lot of training is conducted via webinars and that public disclosure of training materials must include audio and video of the training as well as documents or slideshow presentations used during the training.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support for § 106.45(b)(1)(iii), and the commenters who provided feedback in response to the Department's directed question as to whether this provision adequately addresses training implicated under the proposed rules. The Department agrees with commenters who noted that prohibiting conflicts of interest and bias, including racial bias, on the part of people administering a grievance process is an essential part of providing both parties a fair process and increasing the accuracy and reliability of determinations reached in grievance processes. Recognizing that commenters recounted instances of experience with perceived conflicts of interest and bias that resulted in unfair treatment and biased outcomes, the Department believes that this provision provides a necessary safeguard to improve the impartiality, reliability, and legitimacy of Title IX proceedings.[1032] The Department agrees with a commenter who asserted that recipients should have objective rules for determining when an adjudicator (or Title IX Coordinator, investigator, or person who facilitates an informal resolution process) is biased, and the Department leaves recipients discretion to decide how best to implement the prohibition on conflicts of interest and bias, including whether a recipient wishes to provide a process for parties to assert claims of conflict of interest of bias during the investigation. The Department notes that § 106.45(b)(8) in the final regulations requires recipients to allow both parties equal right to appeal including on the basis that the Title IX Coordinator, investigator, or decision-maker had a conflict of interest or bias that affected the outcome. The Department is persuaded by the numerous commenters who urged the Department to require training materials to be available for public inspection, to create transparency and better effectuate the requirements of § 106.45(b)(1)(iii). The final regulations impose that requirement in § 106.45(b)(10).

Additionally, the Department will not tolerate discrimination on the basis of race, color, or national origin, which is prohibited under Title VI. If any recipient discriminates against any person involved in a Title IX proceeding on the basis of that person's race, color, or national origin, then the Department will address such discrimination under Title VI and its implementing regulations, in addition to such discrimination potentially constituting bias prohibited under § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) of these final regulations.

Changes: The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(10)(i)(D) to require that training materials referred to in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) must be made publicly available on a recipient's website, or if the recipient does not have a website such materials must be made available upon request for inspection by members of the public.

Comments: Several commenters expressed skepticism that any recipient employees can be objective, fair, unbiased, or free from conflicts of interest because a recipient's employees share the recipient's interest in protecting the recipient's reputation or furthering a recipient's financial interests. Some commenters asserted this leads to recipient employees being unwilling to treat complainants fairly while others asserted this leads to recipient employees being unwilling to treat respondents fairly. A few commenters asserted that this problem of inherent conflicts of interest between recipient employees and complainants means that the only way to avoid conflicts of interest is to require recipients to use an external, impartial arbiter or require investigations to be done by people unaffiliated with any students in the school, and one commenter argued that because all paid staff members are biased (in favor of the recipient), the solution is to allow complainants and respondents to pick the persons who run the grievance proceedings similar to jury selection. One commenter suggested that to counter institutional bias, which the commenter argued was on display in notorious cover-up situations at prestigious universities where employees committed sexual abuse, the proposed rules should specifically require training on conflicts of interest caused by employees' misplaced loyalty to the recipient. Another commenter stated that schools must be required to [1029] In support of the proposition that most decisions after a full trial are not based on using race as a proxy but rather on the evidence at trial, resulting in racially fair decisions, while racial bias is rampant in low-stakes, low-evidence decision making where people make decisions on little evidence, the commenter cited Stephen P. Klein, et al., Race and Imprisonment Decisions in California, 247 Science 812 (1990). More than one commenter cited to Driving While Black in Maryland, American Civil Liberties Union (ACLU) (Feb. 2, 2010) https://www.aclu.org/cases/driving-while-black-maryland, for similar propositions.

[1030] Commenters asserted that services for male victims of opposite sex violence are nearly non-existent at educational institutions and in society at large because of an ingrained ''man as perpetrator/woman as victim'' stereotype, which stereotype has always been false, shown by CDC data revealing the prevalence of male victims of sexual violence: Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, The National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey (NISVS): 2015 Data Brief Tables 9, 11 (2018).

[1031] Commenters cited: Caperton v. A. T. Massey Coal Co., 556 U.S. 868, 883 (2009) (holding that a judge cannot hear a case centered on the financial interests of someone who substantially supported the judge's election campaign).

[1032] The 2001 Guidance at 21 contained a similar training recommendation: ''Finally, the school must make sure that all designated employees [referring to designated Title IX Coordinators] have adequate training as to what conduct constitutes sexual harassment and are able to explain how the grievance procedure operates.'' purchase liability insurance covering exposure arising from the handling of sexual harassment claims, to ensure that they do not have a secret conflict of interest that might cause them to put a finger on the scale one way or the other in the course of investigating or adjudicating a Title IX complaint.

Several commenters indicated that this provision seems reasonable but requested clarity as to what might in practice constitute a conflict of interest under § 106.45(b)(1)(iii), with one commenter noting that this issue often arises when a school district hires their legal counsel, insurance carrier, or risk pool to complete an investigation or respond to a formal complaint. Another commenter requested more information on what would constitute ''general bias'' for or against complainants or respondents under this provision, expressing concern that without any framework for evaluating whether a particular administrator is tainted by such bias this provision is amorphous and will add confusion and grounds for attack at smaller institutions where many student affairs administrators fill several different roles. Another commenter asked for clarification that school employees serving in the Title IX process should be presumed to be unbiased notwithstanding having previously investigated a matter involving one or more of particular parties, or else this provision could be quite costly by requiring a school district to hire outside investigators every time an investigator deals with a party more than once.

Several commenters recommended countering inherent institutional conflicts of interest on the part of recipient employees by revising the final regulations to avoid any commingling of administrative and adjudicative roles. Several commenters offered the specific recommendation that the Title IX Coordinator must not be an employment supervisor of the decision-maker in the school's administrative hierarchy and if investigators are independent contractors, the Title IX Coordinator should not have a role in hiring or firing such investigators. The same commenters recommended bolstering neutrality and independence by removing the role of counseling complainants from the office that coordinates the grievance process and requiring that investigators have some degree of institutional independence. One commenter asserted that if the Department intends to prohibit any overlap in responsibilities among the Title IX Coordinator, investigator, or decision-maker, the Department must make that intention clear.

Many commenters requested clarification as to whether this provision's prohibition against conflicts of interest and bias would be interpreted to bar anyone from being a Title IX Coordinator, investigator, or decision-maker if the person currently or in their past has ever advocated for victims' rights or otherwise worked in sexual violence prevention fields. Several commenters argued against such an interpretation because individuals with that kind of experience are often highly knowledgeable about sexual violence and able to serve impartially, while several other commenters argued that Title IX-related personnel are a self-selected group likely to include victim advocates, self-identified victims, and those associated with women's studies and thus come to a Title IX role with biases against men, respondents, or both. One commenter asserted that while the choice of a professor's field of study may or may not indicate bias, the fact that a university relies on volunteers to staff Title IX hearing panels is highly questionable because self-selection creates the likelihood that those who ''want'' to serve on a Title IX hearing board have preconceived ideas and views about whether male students are guilty, regardless of the actual facts and circumstances, and thus the final regulations should require the recipient to select decision-makers based on random selection from its entire faculty and administrators. One commenter shared an example of bias on the part of the single administrator tasked with ruling on the commenter's client's appeal of a responsibility finding, where the appeal decision-maker had recently retweeted a survivor advocacy organization's tweet ''To survivors everywhere, we believe you,'' yet the recipient overruled a bias objection stating that nothing suggested that such a tweet meant the appeal decision-maker was biased against that particular respondent. This commenter proposed adding language explaining that a ''reasonable person'' standard will be applied to determine bias, along with cautionary language that a history of working or advocating on one side or another of this issue might constitute bias. One commenter asserted that Federal courts of appeal, including the Sixth Circuit, agree that ''being a feminist, being affiliated with a gender-studies program, or researching sexual assault does not support a reasonable inference than an individual is biased against men.'' [1033] This commenter believed that the proposed rules offered no clarity on whether the Department would consider bias claims based on being a feminist or working in the sexual assault field to be ''frivolous'' or would be taken seriously.

Several commenters urged the Department to expand this provision to prohibit ''perceived'' conflicts of interest or ''the appearance'' of bias in line with standards that require judges not to have even the appearance of bias or impropriety; other commenters urged the Department to apply a presumption that campus decision-makers are free of bias, noting that courts require proof that a conduct official had an ''actual'' bias against the party because of the party's sex, and the proposed rules seem to reverse this judicial presumption, opening the door to numerous claims that undermine the presumption of honesty in campus proceedings. One commenter suggested a more clearly defined standard by specifying that Title IX personnel not have a personal bias or prejudice for or against complainants or respondents generally, and not have an interest, relationship, or other consideration that may compromise or have the appearance of compromising the individual's judgment with respect to any individual complainant or respondent. One commenter suggested that this provision should require ''nondiscriminatory'' investigations and adjudications instead of being ''not biased.'' One commenter believed that student leaders should take more responsibility for addressing sexual misconduct and might do a better job than bureaucrats can; the commenter asserted that the final regulations should not prohibit recipients from relying on students to investigate and adjudicate sexual misconduct cases.

Discussion: The Department understands commenters' concerns that the final regulations work within a framework where a recipient's own employees are permitted to serve as Title IX personnel,[1034] and the potential conflicts of interest this creates. The final regulations leave recipients flexibility to use their own employees, or to outsource Title IX investigation and adjudication functions, and the Department encourages recipients to pursue alternatives to the inherent difficulties that arise when a recipient's own employees are expected to perform these functions free from conflicts of interest and bias. The Department notes that several commenters favorably described regional center models that could involve recipients coordinating with each other to outsource Title IX grievance proceedings to experts free from potential conflicts of interest stemming from affiliation with the recipient. The Department declines to require recipients to use outside, unaffiliated Title IX personnel because the Department does not conclude that such prescription is necessary to effectuate the purposes of the final regulations; although recipients may face challenges with respect to ensuring that personnel serve free from conflicts of interest and bias, recipients can comply with the final regulations by using the recipient's own employees. Unless prescription is necessary to achieve compliance with the final regulations, the Department does not wish to interfere with recipients' discretion to conduct a recipient's own internal, administrative affairs. The Department is also sensitive to the reality that prescriptions regarding employment relationships likely will result in many recipients being compelled to hire additional personnel in order to comply with these final regulations, and the Department wishes to prescribe only those measures necessary for compliance, without unnecessarily diverting recipients' resources into hiring personnel and away from other priorities important to recipients and the students they serve. For these reasons, the Department declines to define certain employment relationships or administrative hierarchy arrangements as per se prohibited conflicts of interest under § 106.45(b)(1)(iii).[1035] The Department is cognizant that the Department's authority under Title IX extends to regulation of recipients themselves, and not to the individual personnel serving as Title IX Coordinators, investigators, decision-makers, or persons who facilitate an informal resolution process. Thus, the Department will hold a recipient accountable for the end result of using Title IX personnel free from conflicts of interest and bias, regardless of the employment or supervisory relationships among various Title IX personnel. To the extent that recipients wish to adopt best practices to better ensure that conflicts of interest do not cause violations of the final regulations, recipients have discretion to adopt practices suggested by commenters, such as ensuring that investigators have institutional independence or deciding that Title IX Coordinators should have no role in the hiring or firing of investigators.

For similar reasons, the Department declines to state whether particular professional experiences or affiliations do or do not constitute per se violations of § 106.45(b)(1)(iii). The Department acknowledges the concerns expressed both by commenters concerned that certain professional qualifications (e.g., a history of working in the field of sexual violence) may indicate bias, and by commenters concerned that excluding certain professionals out of fear of bias would improperly exclude experienced, knowledgeable individuals who are capable of serving impartially. Whether bias exists requires examination of the particular facts of a situation and the Department encourages recipients to apply an objective (whether a reasonable person would believe bias exists), common sense approach to evaluating whether a particular person serving in a Title IX role is biased, exercising caution not to apply generalizations that might unreasonably conclude that bias exists (for example, assuming that all self-professed feminists, or self-described survivors, are biased against men, or that a male is incapable of being sensitive to women, or that prior work as a victim advocate, or as a defense attorney, renders the person biased for or against complainants or respondents), bearing in mind that the very training required by § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) is intended to provide Title IX personnel with the tools needed to serve impartially and without bias such that the prior professional experience of a person whom a recipient would like to have in a Title IX role need not disqualify the person from obtaining the requisite training to serve impartially in a Title IX role.

In response to commenters' concerns that the prohibition against conflicts of interest and bias is unclear, the Department revises this provision to mandate training in ''how to serve impartially, including by avoiding prejudgment of the facts at issue, conflicts of interest, and bias'' in place of the proposed language for training to ''protect the safety of students, ensure due process protections for all parties, and promote accountability.'' This shift in language is intended to reinforce that recipients have significant control, and flexibility, to prevent conflicts of interest and bias by carefully selecting training content focused on impartiality and avoiding prejudgment of the facts at issue, conflicts of interest, and bias.

The Department disagrees with the commenter who suggested replacing ''bias'' in this provision with ''non-discrimination.'' Based on anecdotal evidence from commenters asserting specific instances that ostensibly reveal a recipient's Title IX personnel exhibiting bias for or against men, women, complainants, or respondents, the Department believes that bias, especially sex-based bias, is a particular risk in Title IX proceedings and aims specifically to reduce and prevent bias from influencing how a recipient responds to sexual harassment including through required training for Title IX personnel.[1036]

The Department declines to narrow or widen this provision by specifying whether conflicts of interest or bias must be ''actual'' or ''perceived,'' and declines to adopt an ''appearance of bias'' standard. As noted above, the topic of sexual harassment inherently involves issues revolving around sex and sexual dynamics such that a standard of ''appearance of'' or ''perceived'' bias might lead to conclusions that most people are biased in one direction or another by virtue of being male, being female, supporting women's rights or supporting men's rights, or having had personal, negative experiences with men or with women. The Department believes that keeping this provision focused on ''bias'' paired with an expectation of impartiality helps appropriately focus on bias that impedes impartiality. The Department cautions parties and recipients from concluding bias, or possible bias, based solely on the outcomes of grievance processes decided under the final regulations; for example, the mere fact that a certain number of outcomes result in determinations of responsibility, or non-responsibility, does not necessarily indicate or imply bias on the part of Title IX personnel. The entire purpose of the § 106.45 grievance process is to increase the reliability and accuracy of outcomes in Title IX proceedings, and the number of particular outcomes, alone, thus does not raise an inference of bias because the final regulations [1035] Although the decision-maker must be different from any individual serving as a Title IX Coordinator or investigator, pursuant to § 106.45(b)(7)(i), the final regulations do not preclude a Title IX Coordinator from also serving as the investigator, and the final regulations do not prescribe any particular administrative ''chain of reporting'' restrictions or declare any such administrative arrangements to be per se conflicts of interest prohibited under § 106.45(b)(1)(iii).

help ensure that each individual case is decided on its merits.

The Department notes that the final regulations do not preclude a recipient from allowing student leaders to serve in Title IX roles so long as the recipient can meet all requirements in § 106.45 and these final regulations,[1037] and leaves it to a recipient's judgment to decide under what circumstances, if any, a recipient wants to involve student leaders in Title IX roles.

Changes: Section 106.45(b)(1)(iii) is revised to specify that the required training include ''how to serve impartially, including by avoiding prejudgment of the facts at issue, conflicts of interest, and bias'' in place of the proposed language ''that protect the safety of students, ensure due process protections for all parties, and promote accountability.'' [1038]

Comments: One commenter asked whether the training on the definition of sexual harassment referenced in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) means the definition in § 106.30, a definition used by the recipient (that might be broader than in § 106.30), or both. One commenter wondered why this provision removes vital sexual harassment training of school personnel but gave no explanation for drawing this conclusion. Several commenters noted that § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) does not state the frequency for the required training and wondered if it must be annual, while several others requested more clarity about what would be considered adequate training especially for a decision-maker expected to conduct a live hearing with cross-examination, and further explanation of what kinds of training materials foster impartial determinations. One commenter stated that § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) does not provide for a standardized level of training or offer financial assistance for training personnel. One commenter agreed with the proposed rules' effort to diagnose severe training gaps in the Title IX system but because this provision mandates training ''conceptually'' without specifying what the training must include, the commenter asserted that the inevitable result will be more Dear Colleague Letters and guidance from the Department, which the Department should avoid by taking time to include more specific training requirements in these final regulations.

Many commenters expressed views about this provision's prohibition against the use of ''sex stereotypes'' in training materials. Some commenters urged the Department to include a definition of ''sex stereotypes,'' asserting that without clarity this provision is a legal morass exposing recipients to liability. One commenter asserted that ''bias'' lacks a definitive legal meaning and should be replaced by ''non-discriminatory.'' Some commenters argued that without a definition, this provision could be interpreted to forbid recipients from relying on research and evidence-based practices that instruct personnel to reject notions of ''regret sex'' and women lying about sexual assault. Other commenters requested clarity that stereotypes of men as sexually aggressive or likely to perpetrate sexual assault and references to ''toxic masculinity'' are prohibited under this provision. One commenter argued that the First Amendment likely prohibits the Department from dictating that training materials be free from sex stereotypes or that if the Department no longer perceives the First Amendment as a barrier to the Federal government prohibiting sex stereotyping materials then the Department should repeal 34 CFR 106.42 and replace it with a prohibition against reliance on sex stereotyping that extends to all training or educational materials used by a recipient for any purpose. This commenter also requested clarification as to whether § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) would prohibit reliance on peer-reviewed journal articles that state, for example,[1039] that trauma victims often recall only some vivid details from their ordeal and that memories may be impaired with amnesia or gaps or contain false details following extreme cases of negative emotions, such as rape trauma. Another commenter expressed concern that this provision might result in information provided by sexual violence experts being forbidden, resulting in respondents' lawyers' opinions replacing peer-reviewed, scientific data. One commenter urged the Department to interpret this provision to require training around bias that exists against complainants and to clarify that the ''Start by Believing'' approach promoted by End Violence Against Women International should be part of these training requirements because that approach trains investigators to start by believing the survivor to avoid incorporating personal bias and victim-blaming myths that might bias the investigation against the survivor. The commenter asserted that understanding the dynamics of sexual trauma is necessary in order to treat both complainants and respondents fairly without bias. Another commenter asserted that ''start by believing'' is not appropriate for investigations but is appropriate for counseling and thus, the final regulations should require that for counseling purposes personnel must ''start by believing'' a complainant or a respondent seeking counseling.

One commenter suggested this provision be modified to require training to have a working understanding of impartiality. One commenter contended that training materials should never be allowed to refer to the AAU/Westat Report [1040] for the statistic that one-in-four women are raped on college campuses because there are so many methodological problems with that report that using it constitutes sex discrimination under Title IX. One commenter argued that § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) must not be applied to exclude the application of proven profiles and indicators of certain predictive behaviors because that is a tried and tested practice in professional law enforcement and should be utilized according to best practices of trained investigators in any quest for the truth.

Discussion: The Department appreciates a commenter asking whether the training on the definition of sexual harassment in this provision was intended to refer to the definition of sexual harassment in § 106.30; to clarify that was the intent of this provision, § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) has been revised to so state. The Department disagrees that this provision removes vital training regarding a recipient's responses to sexual harassment; rather, this provision prescribes mandatory training for Title IX personnel that promotes the purpose of a Title IX process and compliance with these final regulations, and leaves recipients free to adopt additional education and training content that a recipient believes serves the needs of the recipient's community. Commenters correctly noted that the final regulations do not impose an annual or other frequency condition on the mandatory training required in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii). The Department interprets this provision as requiring that any Title IX

[1037] For example, § 106.8(a) specifies that the Title IX Coordinator must be an ''employee'' designated and authorized by the recipient to coordinate the recipient's efforts to comply with Title IX obligations. No such requirement of employee status applies to, for instance, serving as a decision-maker on a hearing panel.

[1038] Because revised § 106.45(b)(8) now requires recipients to offer appeals, § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) has also been revised to include training on conducting appeals.

Coordinator, investigator, decision-maker, or person who facilitates an informal resolution process will, when serving in such a role, be trained to serve in that role. The Department wishes to leave recipients flexibility to decide to what extent additional training is needed to ensure that Title IX personnel are trained when they serve [1041] so that recipients efficiently allocate their resources among Title IX compliance obligations and other important needs of their educational communities. The Department disagrees with a commenter concerned that failing to be more prescriptive about the content of training in these final regulations necessarily will result in the Department issuing Dear Colleague Letters imposing training content requirements in the future. The Department is committed to imposing legally binding requirements by following applicable rulemaking processes.

The Department is persuaded by commenters' concerns that it is beneficial for § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to emphasize the need for decision-makers to receive training in how to conduct hearings, and we have revised this provision to specify that decision-makers receive training in how to conduct a grievance process including how to use technology that will be used by a recipient to conduct a live hearing, and on issues of the relevance of questions and evidence (including how to determine the relevance or irrelevance of a complainant's prior sexual history), and that investigators receive training on issues of relevance in order to prepare an investigative report that fairly summarizes relevant evidence.

The Department appreciates the many commenters who requested a definition of ''sex stereotypes'' and asked that such a definition include, or exclude, particular generalizations and notions about women or about men. For reasons similar to those discussed above with respect to defining ''bias'' on the part of Title IX personnel, the Department declines to list or define what notions do or do not constitute sex stereotypes on which training materials must not rely. The Department disagrees that a broad prohibition against sex stereotypes is a legal morass exposing recipients to liability, any more than Title IX's broad prohibition against ''sex discrimination'' does so. It is not feasible to catalog the variety of notions expressing generalizations and stereotypes about the sexes that might constitute sex stereotypes, and the Department's interest in ensuring impartial Title IX proceedings that avoid prejudgment of the facts at issue necessitates a broad prohibition on sex stereotypes so that decisions are made on the basis of individualized facts and not on stereotypical notions of what ''men'' or ''women'' do or do not do. To reinforce this necessity, the final regulations use ''must'' instead of ''may'' to state that training materials ''must'' not rely on sex stereotypes.

Contrary to the concerns of some commenters, a prohibition against reliance on sex stereotypes does not forbid training content that references evidence-based information or peer-reviewed scientific research into sexual violence dynamics, including the impact of trauma on sexual assault victims. Rather, § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) cautions recipients not to use training materials that ''rely'' on sex stereotypes in training Title IX personnel on how to serve in those roles impartially and without prejudgment of the facts at issue, meaning that research and data concerning sexual violence dynamics may be valuable and useful, but cannot be relied on to apply generalizations to particular allegations of sexual harassment. Commenters provided numerous examples of training materials containing phrases that may, or may not, violate the final regulations, but a fact-specific evaluation of the training materials and their use by the recipient would be needed to reach a conclusion regarding whether such materials comply with § 106.45(b)(1)(iii). We have revised § 106.45(b)(10) to require recipients to post on a recipient's website the training materials referred to in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) so that a recipient's approach to training Title IX personnel may be transparently viewed by the recipient's educational community and the public, including for the purpose of holding a recipient accountable for using training materials that comply with these final regulations.

The Department does not believe that placing parameters around the training materials specifically needed to comply with Title IX regulations violates the First Amendment rights of recipients because the final regulations do not interfere with the right of recipients to control the recipient's own curricula and academic instruction materials. The Department is not proactively scouring recipients' curricula to spot instances of sex stereotyping; rather, the Department is placing reasonable conditions on materials specifically used by recipients to carry out recipients' obligations under these final regulations.

For reasons explained above, the Department does not wish to be more prescriptive than necessary to achieve the purposes of these final regulations, and respects the discretion of recipients to choose how best to serve the needs of each recipient's community with respect to the content of training provided to Title IX personnel so long as the training meets the requirements in these final regulations. Thus, the Department declines to require recipients to adopt the ''Start by Believing'' approach promoted by End Violence Against Women, and cautions that a training approach that encourages Title IX personnel to ''believe'' one party or the other would fail to comply with the requirement that Title IX personnel be trained to serve impartially, and violate § 106.45(b)(1)(ii) precluding credibility determinations based on a party's status as a complainant or respondent. The Department takes no position on whether ''start by believing'' should be an approach adopted by non-Title IX personnel affiliated with a recipient, such as counselors who provide services to complainants or respondents. The Department wishes to emphasize that parties should be treated with equal dignity and respect by Title IX personnel, but doing so does not mean that either party is automatically ''believed.'' The credibility of any party, as well as ultimate conclusions about responsibility for sexual harassment, must not be prejudged and must be based on objective evaluation of the relevant evidence in a particular case; for this reason, the Department cautions against training materials that promote the application of ''profiles'' or ''predictive behaviors'' to particular cases. The Department declines to predetermine whether particular studies or reports do or do not violate § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) or opine on the validity of particular reports, but encourages recipients to examine the information utilized in training of Title IX personnel to ensure compliance with this provision.

Changes: Section 106.45(b)(1)(iii) clarifies that the training on the definition of sexual harassment means [1041] Some commenters questioned whether advisors provided to a party by a postsecondary institution recipient pursuant to § 106.45(b)(6)(i) must be free from conflicts of interest and bias and must be trained. The final regulations impose no prohibition of conflict of interest or bias for such advisors, nor any training requirement for such advisors, in order to leave recipients as much flexibility as possible to comply with the requirement to provide those advisors. The Department believes that advisors in such a role do not need to be unbiased or lack conflicts of interest precisely because the role of such advisor is to conduct cross-examination on behalf of one party, and recipients can determine to what extent a recipient wishes to provide training for advisors whom a recipient may need to provide to a party to conduct cross-examination.

the definition in § 106.30,[1042] requires Title IX personnel to be trained on how to conduct a grievance process, requires investigators and decision-makers to be trained on issues of relevance (including when questions and evidence about a complainant's sexual predisposition or prior sexual behavior are not relevant), requires decision-makers to be trained on technology to be used at any live hearing, and changes ''may'' to ''must'' in the directive that training materials not rely on sex stereotypes.

Comments: Several commenters suggested that § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) be expanded to include training for Title IX personnel on a variety of subjects. At least one commenter urged the Department to adopt the training language from the withdrawn 2014 Q&A.[1043] Without referencing the 2014 Q&A a few commenters suggested that training address similar topics such as: The neurobiology of trauma, counterintuitive responses to sexual violence, false reporting, barriers to reporting, incapacitation versus intoxication and blackout behaviors, assessing credibility in the context of trauma, Title IX compliance as it intersects with the Clery Act, FERPA, child protective services legislation, disability laws, and other laws that may intersect with Title IX, healthy sexuality and consent including affirmative consent, risk factors for sexual violence victimization, bystander intervention, rates of prevalence, addressing bias using an anti-oppression framework, effective interviewing of survivors such as forensic experiential models, cultural competency to address specific issues that affect marginalized survivors (e.g., LGBTQ individuals, persons with disabilities, persons of color, or persons who are undocumented or economically disadvantaged).

One commenter stated that training should ensure that Title IX personnel are first ''mentored'' by someone with experience before working directly with survivors. One commenter suggested the Department create an aspirational list of training components. One commenter asked the Department to define ''training materials'' as limited to material the recipient itself designates as essential for performing the applicable Title IX role, so as not to sweep up a range of professional continuing education presentations into the ambit of § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) just because such professional training seminars might mention something relevant to Title IX.

Discussion: For the reasons explained above, the Department has determined that § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) in the final regulations strikes the appropriate balance between mandating training topics the Department believe are necessary to promote a recipient's compliance with these final regulations while leaving as much flexibility as possible to recipients to choose the content and substance of training topics in addition to the topics mandated by this provision. Thus, the Department declines to expand this provision to mandate that training address the topics suggested by commenters. As discussed in this preamble under the § 106.44(a) ''education program or activity'' condition, the final regulations revise the training requirements in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to require training of Title IX personnel on the ''scope of the recipient's education program or activity.'' The Department makes this change in response to commenters concerned that the ''education program or activity'' condition was misunderstood too narrowly, for example as excluding all sexual harassment incidents that occur off campus. This revision to the training requirements in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) helps to ensure that recipients do not inadvertently fail to treat as Title IX matters sexual harassment incidents that occur in the recipient's education program or activity. As explained above in this section of the preamble, we have also revised this provision to: Add training on appeals and informal resolution processes in addition to hearings (as applicable); specify that Title IX personnel must be trained on the definition of sexual harassment in § 106.30 and on how to serve impartially without prejudgment of the facts at issue and how to avoid bias and conflicts of interest; specify that investigators and decision-makers must be trained on issues of relevance; and specify that decision-makers receive training on how to use technology at live hearings. As explained below in this section of the preamble, we also revise § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to include ''person who facilitates an informal resolution process'' to the list of Title IX personnel who must receive training.

The Department declines to require that Title IX personnel be ''mentored'' before working with parties, or to create an aspirational list of training components. The Department's intent with respect to this provision is to provide flexibility for each recipient to design or select training components that best serve the recipient's unique needs and educational environment, while prescribing those training topics necessary for a recipient to comply with these final regulations. The Department appreciates the commenter's request for clarification that the training materials subject to these final regulations should be only those training materials specifically designated by the recipient as essential to performing Title IX personnel functions. In order to reasonably gauge compliance with the final regulations, the Department instead reserves the right to examine training materials whether or not a recipient has not specifically designated the material as essential to performing a Title IX role.

Changes: The final regulations revise this provision to include training on the scope of a recipient's education program or activity; add training on appeals and informal resolution processes in addition to hearings (as applicable); specify that Title IX personnel must be trained on the definition of sexual harassment in § 106.30 and on how to serve impartially without prejudgment of the facts at issue and how to avoid bias and conflicts of interest; specify that investigators and decision-makers must be trained on issues of relevance; specify that decision-makers receive training on how to use technology at live hearings; and add ''person who facilitates an informal resolution process'' to the list of Title IX personnel who must receive training.

Comments: Many commenters expressed views about whether § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) should be applied to include or exclude training materials promoting ''trauma-informed'' practices, techniques, and approaches. One commenter believed that using ''impartial'' instead of ''trauma-informed'' is offensive to rape victims, for whom trauma necessitates a cognitive interview that takes the effects of trauma into account, while another [1042] As discussed in the ''Section 106.44(a) 'education program or activity' '' subsection of the ''Section 106.44 Recipient's Response to Sexual Harassment, Generally'' section of this preamble, the training requirements for Title IX personnel in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) now also include training on the scope of the recipient's education program or activity.

[1043] Commenters cited: 2014 Q&A at 40 (''Training should include information on working with and interviewing persons subjected to sexual violence; information on particular types of conduct that would constitute sexual violence, including same-sex sexual violence; the proper standard of review for sexual violence complaints (preponderance of the evidence standard); information on consent and the role drugs or alcohol can play in the ability to consent; the importance of accountability for individuals found to have committed sexual violence; the need for remedial actions for the perpetrator, complainant, and school community; how to determine credibility; how to evaluate evidence and weigh it in an impartial manner; how to conduct investigations; confidentiality; the effects of trauma, including neurobiological change; and cultural awareness training regarding how sexual violence may impact students differently depending on their cultural backgrounds.'').

commenter believed training must require trauma-informed best practices. A few commenters believed that the provision should address the use of trauma-informed theories by cautioning against misuse of victim-centered approaches for any purpose other than interviewing or counseling; these commenters distinguished between remaining ''impartial,'' one the one hand, while still using trauma-informed methods when questioning a complainant so that the investigator does not expect a trauma victim to provide details in chronological order, on the other hand. Several commenters asserted that trauma-informed and believe-the-victim approaches must be prohibited in the interview process because those approaches compromise objectivity, create presumptions of guilt, and result in exclusion of relevant (often exculpatory) evidence. At least one commenter suggested that FETI (forensic experimental trauma interview) techniques should be required. One commenter stated that several states including New York, California, and Illinois mandate trauma-informed training [1044] for campus officials who respond to sexual assault and asserted that the proposed rules are unclear about whether the Department's position is that trauma-informed practices constitute a form of sex discrimination,[1045] thus inviting further litigation on this issue.

Discussion: The Department understands from personal anecdotes and research studies that sexual violence is a traumatic experience for survivors. The Department is aware that the neurobiology of trauma and the impact of trauma on a survivor's neurobiological functioning is a developing field of study with application to the way in which investigators of sexual violence offenses interact with victims in criminal justice systems and campus sexual misconduct proceedings. The Department appreciates the views of commenters urging that trauma-informed practices be mandatory, and those urging that such practices be forbidden, and the commenters noting that trauma-informed practices are required in some States, and noting there is a difference between applying such practices in different contexts (i.e., interview and questioning techniques, providing counseling services, or when making investigatory decisions about relevant evidence and credibility or adjudicatory decisions about responsibility). For reasons explained above, the Department believes that § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) appropriately forbids conflicts of interest and bias, mandates training on topics necessary to promote recipients' compliance with these final regulations (including how to serve impartially), and precludes training materials that rely on sex stereotypes. Recipients have flexibility to choose how to meet those requirements in a way that best serves the needs, and reflects the values, of a recipient's community including selecting best practices that exceed (though must be consistent with) the legal requirements imposed by these final regulations. The Department notes that although there is no fixed definition of ''trauma-informed'' practices with respect to all the contexts to which such practices may apply in an educational setting, practitioners and experts believe that application of such practices is possible—albeit challenging—to apply in a truly impartial, non-biased manner.[1046]

Changes: None.

Comments: One commenter suggested expanding the persons who must be trained to include counselors, diversity and inclusion departments, deans of students, ombudspersons, and restorative justice committees. A few commenters suggested that training about Title IX rights and Title IX procedures should be mandatory for all students and all staff, including teachers and faculty so that everyone affiliated with a recipient knows the definition of sexual harassment and the complaint procedures. A few commenters noted that the proposed rules lacked any training requirements for staff that work on informal resolution processes and urged the Department to set minimum standards for training of those individuals so that all students are served by individuals with high levels of training whether they go through a formal or informal process.

Discussion: The intent of § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) is to ensure that Title IX personnel directly involved in carrying out the recipient's Title IX response duties are trained in a manner that promotes a recipient's compliance with these final regulations. The Department appreciates commenters suggesting that additional school personnel, or students, need training about Title IX, but the Department leaves such decisions to recipients' discretion. The Department appreciates commenters who noted that the proposed rules contemplated the recipient facilitating informal resolution processes yet omitted such a role from the listed personnel who must receive training under § 106.45(b)(1)(iii), resulting in parties interacting with well-trained personnel during a formal process but perhaps with untrained personnel during an informal process. The commenters' concerns are well-founded, and the final regulations include ''any person who facilitates an informal resolution process'' wherever reference had been made to ''Title IX Coordinators, investigators, and decision-makers.''

Changes: Section 106.45(b)(1)(iii) is revised to include ''any person who facilitates an informal resolution process'' in addition to Title IX Coordinators, investigators, and decision-makers, as a person whom the recipient must ensure is free from conflicts of interest and bias, and receives the training specified in this provision.

Comments: At least one commenter requested more information about who is expected to provide the training required under § 106.45(b)(1)(iii), for example whether training presenters must have experience with administrative proceedings in order to provide qualified training to others. One commenter with extensive experience as a sexual assault investigator proposed that the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center (FLETC) should be

This is distinct from a trauma-informed approach to evaluating the testimony of parties or witnesses. The use of trauma-informed approaches to evaluating evidence can lead adjudicators to overlook significant inconsistencies on the part of complainants in a manner that is incompatible with due process protections for the respondent. mandated to create a Title IX focused training program to which recipients would send Title IX investigators within a certain time frame after being hired; the commenter stated that FLETC already has instructors, resources, and qualified, experienced professionals that provide accredited training to sexual assault investigators, so expanding FLETC training to be specific to Title IX proceedings would create consistent knowledge and best practices across all institutions.

Discussion: For reasons explained above, the Department believes that the mandated training requirements in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) are sufficient to effectuate the purposes of these final regulations, without unduly restricting recipients' flexibility to design and select training that best serves each recipient's unique needs. For similar reasons, the Department declines to prescribe whether training presenters must possess certain qualifications and will enforce § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) based on whether a recipient trains Title IX personnel in conformity with this provision rather than on the qualifications or expertise of the trainers. The Department appreciates the commenter's suggestion regarding FLETC creating a Title IX-specific training program. While adoption of that suggestion is outside the scope of these final regulations because it is not within the Department's regulatory authority under Title IX to direct FLETC to expand its programming,[1047] the Department encourages recipients to pursue training from sources that rely on qualified, experienced professionals likely to result in best practices for effective, impartial investigations. The Department does not certify, endorse, or otherwise approve or disapprove of particular organizations (whether for-profit or non-profit) or individuals that provide Title IX-related training and consulting services to recipients. Whether or not a recipient has complied with § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) is not determined by the source of the training materials or training presentations utilized by a recipient.

Section 106.45(b)(1)(iv) Presumption of Non-Responsibility

Purpose of the Presumption

Comments: Many commenters supported § 106.45(b)(1)(iv), requiring a recipient's grievance process to apply a presumption that a respondent is not responsible until conclusion of a grievance process (referred to in this section as the ''presumption''), because such a presumption means that recipients will adjudicate based on evidence rather than beliefs or assumptions. Commenters referred to the presumption as the equivalent of a ''presumption of innocence'' which, commenters asserted, is crucial for determining the truth of what happened when one party levies an accusation against another party. Commenters shared personal experiences with campus Title IX proceedings in which the commenters believed that the process unfairly placed the respondent in a position of having to try to prove non-responsibility rather than being treated as not responsible unless evidence proved otherwise. Commenters who agreed with the presumption asserted that, especially under a preponderance of the evidence standard, it is important that an accused student be presumed innocent, to stress for decision-makers that if they believe the complainant and respondent are equally truthful, the required finding must be not-responsible. Commenters asserted that lawsuits filed against universities by respondents accused of sexual misconduct have revealed that universities often do not presume the respondent innocent [1048] and that this may lead schools to place the burden of proof on respondents.[1049] Commenters asserted that § 106.45(b)(1)(iv) will clarify that respondents do not have the burden of proving their innocence.

Several commenters who supported the presumption cited an article arguing that believing complainants is the beginning and the end of a search for the truth.[1050] Several commenters asserted that the mantra of ''Believe Survivors'' encourages a presumption of guilt against respondents. Other commenters opined that a person can both believe complainants and presume the respondent is innocent during an investigation.

Commenters argued that the presumption of non-responsibility is essential to affording respondents an opportunity to defend themselves. Commenters supportive of the presumption shared personal stories in which they or their family members were respondents in Title IX grievance hearings and as respondents and felt as though the recipient placed the burden of proving innocence on the respondent's shoulders and made it seem that the accusations had been prejudged as truthful; others shared experiences of interim suspensions imposed prior to any facts or evidence leading to a conclusion of ''guilt.'' Commenters argued that it is imperative that accusations are not equated with ''guilt.'' One commenter described living in countries that were behind the Iron Curtain, where to be accused was the same as to be proven guilty without evidence.

Commenters who opposed the presumption argued that the purpose of the presumption is to favor respondents over complainants. Commenters asserted that the presumption is evidence of the Department's animus towards complainants. Commenters asserted that the presumption codifies a unique status for sexual harassment and assault complainants, explicitly requiring that schools treat them with heightened skepticism. Additionally, several commenters argued that the Department proposed the presumption because the Department seeks to perpetuate the myth of false reporting in Federal policy and desires to protect the reputation and interests of the accused. Commenters argued that the presumption gives special, greater rights to the respondent, creating a procedural bias against complainants that violates complainants' rights to an impartial grievance procedure under Title IX and the Clery Act.

Many commenters argued that the presumption of non-responsibility is a presumption that the alleged harassment did not occur. Commenters questioned how the recipient can adequately listen to the complainant if the recipient is required to presume that no harassment occurred. Commenters argued that the presumption creates a hostile environment for complainants by implying that the complainant is dishonest. Commenters argued that the presumption will increase negative social reactions to complainants, such as minimization and victim-blaming, and predicted that these negative reactions will create adverse health effects for complainants including post-traumatic stress disorder symptoms.

Commenters opposed the requirement in the proposed rules for the recipient to expressly state the presumption of non-responsibility in its first communication with the complainant, arguing that this provision seems ''deliberately cruel'' towards complainants.

Commenters argued that the presumption would encourage schools to ignore or punish historically marginalized groups that report sexual harassment by implying such complainants are ''lying'' about sexual harassment, and that complainants will feel chilled from reporting out of belief that they will be retaliated against (i.e., by being punished for ''lying'') when they do report.[1051]

Commenters asserted that in a criminal proceeding, there is an imbalance of power between the accused person and the government prosecuting the accused, and therefore the U.S. Constitution gives the criminal defendant a presumption of innocence; commenters argued that this dynamic is absent in a Title IX proceeding where the complainant does not represent the power of the government prosecuting a criminal defendant, and thus a Title IX respondent should not enjoy the presumption given to a criminal defendant.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support for § 106.45(b)(1)(iv) and acknowledges the many commenters who shared personal experiences as respondents in Title IX proceedings where the investigation process made the commenter feel like the burden was on the respondent to prove non-responsibility rather than being presumed not responsible unless evidence showed otherwise.

The Department disagrees with commenters who believed that the purpose of the presumption of non-responsibility is to favor respondents at the expense of complainants or that a presumption of non-responsibility demonstrates animus or hostility toward complainants. The Department does not seek to ''perpetuate the myth of false reporting in Federal policy,'' nor does it desire ''to protect the reputation and interests of the accused'' at the expense of victims as some commenters claimed. To the contrary, we seek to establish a fair grievance process for all parties, and the presumption does not affect or diminish the strong procedural rights granted to complainants throughout the grievance process.

The Department acknowledges that these final regulations apply only to allegations of Title IX sexual harassment, and as such these final regulations do not impose a presumption of non-responsibility in other types of student misconduct proceedings. This does not indicate that the allegations in formal complaints of sexual harassment are more suspect or warrant more skepticism than allegations of other types of misconduct. The Department believes that the notion of presuming a student not responsible until facts show otherwise represents a basic concept of fairness, but these regulations address only recipients' responses to Title IX sexual harassment and do not dictate whether a similar presumption should be applied to other forms of student misconduct.

While the Department acknowledges that Title IX proceedings are not criminal in nature and do not require application of constitutional protections granted to criminal defendants, the Department believes that a presumption of non-responsibility is critical to ensuring a fair proceeding in the Title IX sexual harassment context, rooted in the same principle that underlies the constitutional presumption of innocence afforded to criminal defendants.[1052] In the noncriminal context of a Title IX grievance process, the presumption reinforces the final regulations' prohibition against a recipient treating a respondent as responsible until conclusion of a grievance process [1053] and reinforces correct application of the standard of evidence selected by the recipient for use in the recipient's Title IX sexual harassment grievance process. These aspects of the presumption improve the fairness of the process and increase party and public confidence in such outcomes,[1054] thereby leading to greater compliance with rules against sexual misconduct.[1055] Without expressly stating a presumption of non-responsibility, a perception that recipients may prejudge respondents as responsible will continue to negatively affect party and public confidence in Title IX proceedings.[1056] [1053] Sections 106.44(a), 106.45(b)(1)(i) (recipients may not impose disciplinary sanctions on a respondent, or otherwise take actions against the respondent that do not constitute supportive measures as defined in § 106.30, without following a grievance process that complies with § 106.45). The final regulations expressly allow exceptions to this principle, where in certain circumstances a respondent may be treated adversely even though responsibility has not been determined at the conclusion of a grievance process. See § 106.30 (defining ''supportive measures'' under which a supportive measure must not ''unreasonably burden'' the other party, so reasonably burdening a respondent to accomplish the aim of a supportive measure is permissible); § 106.44(c) (a respondent may be removed from education programs or activities where the respondent poses an immediate threat to the physical health or safety of one or more individuals, and while a post-removal opportunity to challenge the removal must be given to the respondent, such an emergency removal may occur prior to conclusion of a grievance process or where no grievance process is pending at all); § 106.44(d) (allowing a recipient to place a (non-student) employee on administrative leaving while an investigation under § 106.45 is pending). The Department notes that in an essay cited by commenters, the author criticizes the presumption of non-responsibility in the NPRM, arguing that if the presumption is intended only to mean that the burden of proof remains on the recipient (and not on the respondent) then the presumption is ''unobjectionable as a matter of substance, although a seeming invitation to confusion'' because recipients may wrongly believe that a presumption of non-responsibility implies that the recipient must apply the criminal burden of proof (beyond a reasonable doubt). Michael C. Dorf, What Does a Presumption of Non-Responsibility Mean in a Civil Context, Dorf On Law (Nov. 28, 2018), http://www.dorfonlaw.org/2018/11/what-does-presumption-of-non.html. The author recognized that the second purpose of the presumption seemed to be treating the respondent as not responsible throughout a grievance process and believed that to be ''quite a bad idea'' because in daily life we make decisions based on someone being accused of a crime even before a conviction. The author correctly noted that one purpose of the presumption is to reinforce that the burden of proof remains on the recipient and not on the respondent (or complainant). The Department clarifies that contrary to the author's concerns, and for reasons discussed in the ''Section 106.45(b)(7)(i) Standard of Evidence and Directed Question 6'' subsection of the ''Determinations Regarding Responsibility'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble, recipients may not apply the criminal standard of beyond a reasonable doubt. Further, while the author of that essay correctly identified a second purpose of the presumption as ensuring that recipients do not treat the respondent as responsible until the respondent is proved responsible, as explained above in this footnote that principle is subject to exceptions.

On the other hand, nothing about this presumption deprives complainants of the robust procedural protections granted to both parties under § 106.45, or the protections granted only to complainants in § 106.44(a) (including the right to be offered supportive measures with or without filing a formal complaint). The presumption does not imply that the alleged harassment did not occur; the presumption ensures that recipients do not take action against a respondent as though the harassment occurred prior to the allegations being proved,[1057] and the final regulations require a recipient's Title IX personnel to interact with both the complainant and respondent in an impartial manner throughout the grievance process without prejudgment of the facts at issue,[1058] and without drawing inferences about credibility based on a party's status as a complainant or respondent.[1059] The presumption therefore serves rather than frustrates the goal of an impartial process. The Department expects that a fair grievance process will lend greater legitimacy to the resolution of complainants' allegations, which will improve the environment for complainants rather than perpetuate a hostile environment or increase negative social reactions to complainants, such as disbelief and blame. The presumption of non-responsibility does not interfere with a complainant's right under § 106.44(a) to receive supportive measures offered by the recipient; this obligation imposed on recipients does not depend at all on waiting for evidence to show a respondent's responsibility. Section 106.44(a) is intended to assure complainants of a prompt, supportive response from their school, college, or university notwithstanding the recipient's obligation not to treat the respondent as responsible for sexual harassment until the conclusion of a grievance process.

While the recipient must include a statement of the presumption in the initial written notice sent to both parties after a formal complaint has been filed,[1060] the Department does not believe that this communication from the recipient is ''deliberately cruel'' to complainants; rather, both parties benefit from understanding that the purpose of a grievance process is to reach reliable decisions based on evidence instead of equating allegations with the outcome, especially where the recipient's own code of conduct penalizes a party for making false statements during a grievance proceeding. The final regulations place the burden of proof solely on a recipient[1061]—not on a complainant or respondent—and therefore the presumption does not operate to burden or disfavor a complainant. Under § 106.44(a) and the § 106.30 definition of ''supportive measures,'' recipients must offer complainants supportive measures designed to restore or preserve complainants' equal educational access (with or without a grievance process pending), and the final regulations' prohibition against a recipient punishing a respondent without following a fair grievance process, including application of a presumption of non-responsibility until conclusion of the grievance process, does not diminish the supportive, meaningful response that a recipient is obligated to offer complainants.[1062]

The Department disagrees that the presumption would encourage schools to ignore or punish historically marginalized groups that report sexual harassment, for ''lying'' about it. The Department requires a recipient to respond promptly to actual knowledge of sexual harassment in its education program or activity against a person in the United States, including by offering supportive measures to the complainant. Thus, ignoring sexual harassment violates these final regulations and places the recipient's Federal funding in jeopardy. The presumption does not imply that a respondent is truthful or that a complainant is lying, and a recipient cannot use the presumption as an excuse not to respond to a complainant as required under § 106.44(a), or not to objectively evaluate all relevant evidence in reaching a determination regarding responsibility. Finally, § 106.71(b)(2) cautions recipients that it may constitute retaliation to punish a complainant (or any party) for making false statements unless the recipient determines that the party made materially false statements in bad faith and that determination is not based solely on the outcome of the case.

The Department acknowledges that Title IX grievance processes are very different from criminal proceedings and that the presumption of innocence afforded to criminal defendants is not a constitutional requirement in Title IX proceedings, but believes that a presumption of non-responsibility is needed in Title IX proceedings. While commenters correctly noted that a complainant does not wield the power of the government prosecuting a criminal charge, the purposes served by the presumption of non-responsibility still apply: Ensuring that the burden of proof remains on the recipient (not on the respondent or complainant) and that the standard of evidence is correctly applied, and ensuring the recipient does not treat the respondent as responsible until conclusion of the grievance process. The procedural requirements of § 106.45 equalize the rights of complainants and respondents to participate in the investigation and adjudication by presenting each party's own view of the evidence and desire for the case outcome, while leaving the burden of gathering evidence and the burden of proof on the recipient.

Changes: We have added § 106.71(a) to the final regulations, prohibiting retaliation against any person exercising rights under Title IX. In addition, § 106.71(b)(2) clarifies that charging an individual with a code of conduct violation for making a materially false statement in bad faith in the course of a grievance process does not constitute retaliation, but a determination regarding responsibility, alone, is not sufficient to conclude that an individual made a materially false statement in bad faith.

Students of Color, LGBTQ Students, and Individuals With Disabilities

Comments: Multiple commenters asserted that, because of the presumption of non-responsibility, schools may be more likely to ignore or punish survivors who are women and girls of color, pregnant and parenting students, and LGBTQ students because resources/spotlight/due-process-reports/due-process-report-2017/, finding that ''Nearly three-quarters (73.6%) of America's top 53 universities do not even guarantee students that they will be presumed innocent until proven guilty.'' The Department recognizes that a presumption of non-liability does not formally apply in Federal civil lawsuits the way that a presumption of innocence applies to criminal defendants; however, civil court procedures do generally place the burden of proof on the plaintiff to prove the defendant's civil liability, which echoes the principle that civil defendants generally are not liable until proved otherwise.

[1057] Under § 106.45(b)(9), a recipient may choose to facilitate an informal resolution process (except as to allegations that an employee sexually harassed a student) and an informal resolution may result in the parties, and the recipient, agreeing on a resolution of the allegations of a formal complaint that involves punishing or disciplining a respondent. This result comports with the prescription in § 106.44(a) and § 106.45(b)(1)(i) that a recipient may not discipline a respondent without following a grievance process that complies with § 106.45, because § 106.45 expressly authorizes a recipient to pursue an informal resolution process (with the informed, written, voluntary consent of both parties).

of harmful stereotypes. Commenters argued that the presumption would especially harm Asian Pacific Islander women who, because of social taboos about sexual activity prevalent in Asian cultures, are significantly less likely to report instances of sexual assault and will feel further deterred by a presumption favoring the respondent. Commenters argued that Black women and girls are more likely to be punished by schools who stereotype them as the aggressor when they defend themselves against their harassers or when they respond to trauma.

Several commenters argued that the presumption would harm students with disabilities because they are more likely to be victims of sexual assault and may be particularly vulnerable to unfair treatment due to the presumption of non-responsibility, and because students with disabilities are less likely to be believed when they report these experiences and often have greater difficulty describing the harassment they experience.[1063] One commenter opposed § 106.45(b)(1)(iv) because the provision does not address sexual harassment and assault cases involving students with disabilities.

Other commenters who agreed with the proposed rules, including the presumption, recounted personal stories in which family members and friends who are Black males were falsely accused of sexual assault yet the recipient seemed to treat the respondent as guilty unless proven innocent. One commenter asserted that the sexual assault grievance process has become a tool for white administrators to punish Black males as young as five years old. The commenter wished to see what they called an outdated Jim Crow-era system replaced with a system that is fair to all.

Other commenters supported this provision based on personal stories about students with disabilities whom commenters believed had been falsely accused of sexual misconduct, including students with autism who found the Title IX grievance process traumatic.

Discussion: The Department understands commenters' concerns that students of color, LGBTQ students, students with disabilities, and other students will be adversely affected by the presumption of non-responsibility. The Department does not believe that the presumption will adversely affect the rights of any complainant, including complainants of demographic groups who may suffer sexual harassment at greater rates than members of other demographic groups. The Department believes that a presumption that protects respondents from being treated as responsible until conclusion of a grievance process furthers the recipient's obligation to fairly resolve allegations of sexual harassment and increases the likelihood that every outcome will carry greater legitimacy.

Further, students of color, LGBTQ students, and students with disabilities may be respondents in Title IX grievance processes, in which situation the presumption of non-responsibility reinforces the recipient's obligation not to prejudge responsibility, countering negative stereotypes that may affect such respondents.

The presumption of non-responsibility in § 106.45(b)(1)(iv) does not contribute to negative stereotypes that commenters characterize as causing people to disbelieve students of color, pregnant or parenting students, LGBTQ students, or students with disabilities (or conversely, to rush to assume the responsibility of such students based on similar negative stereotypes). The presumption protects respondents against being treated as responsible until conclusion of the grievance process but this does not entail disbelieving complainants. Any person may be a complainant or a respondent, and the final regulations require all Title IX personnel to serve impartially, without prejudging the facts at issue, and without bias toward complainants or respondents generally or toward an individual complainant or respondent.

Changes: None.

The Complainant's Right to Due Process Protections

Comments: Commenters argued that the presumption of non-responsibility is a deprivation of the complainant's own due process rights, and argued that the complainant will be forced to proceed blindly, at a severe information deficit, while being forced to overcome the presumption. Other commenters argued that merely stating that the recipient will bear the burden of proof does not in practical terms make it so, and a presumption that the respondent is not responsible in reality shifts the burden of proof onto the complainant. Many commenters asserted that the respondent should bear the burden to prove the respondent is innocent.

One commenter, citing John Doe v. University of Cincinnati,[1064] noted that a court in the Southern District of Ohio found no violation of due process where the respondent argued that the recipient failed to grant the respondent a presumption of non-responsibility. Another commenter asserted that the U.S. Supreme Court has already balanced the competing interests and determined what process is due and it does not require a presumption of non-responsibility, because in Mathews v. Eldridge [1065] the U.S. Supreme Court considered (1) the private interest that will be affected; (2) the risk of an erroneous deprivation of such interest through procedures used, and the probable value, if any, of additional procedural safeguards; and (3) the government's interest, yet did not specify that a presumption favoring any party was required.

Many commenters argued that the presumption will make many women feel it is not worth it to report their assaulters to authorities because survivors already often do not report their sexual assaults due to fear of being disbelieved and the presumption will only heighten the perception that the recipient believes respondents and disbelieves complainants.[1066] One commenter asserted that, out of every 1,000 rapes, only 230 are reported to police, and just five result in conviction,[1067] and argued that a presumption in favor of respondents will lead to even fewer perpetrators of rape being held accountable.

Discussion: The presumption of non-responsibility does not hold complainants to a higher standard of evidence, shift the burden of proof onto complainants, require complainants to ''overcome'' the presumption or proceed ''blindly'' through an investigation, or deny complainants due process. Rather, the presumption simply requires that the recipient not treat the respondent as responsible until the recipient has objectively evaluated the evidence, and reinforces application of the standard of evidence the recipient has already selected (which may be the preponderance of the evidence standard, or the clear and convincing evidence standard).[1068] The final regulations require the burden of proof to remain on the recipient,[1069] and the recipient must reach a determination of responsibility against the respondent if the evidence meets the applicable standard of evidence. The complainant therefore does not bear any burden of proof and does not have to ''overcome'' the presumption. The presumption does not negate the strong procedural protections given to complainants throughout the grievance process, and these due process protections ensure that complainants have a meaningful opportunity (equal to that of respondents) to put forward the complainant's own evidence and arguments about the evidence, even though the burden of proof remains on the recipient.

The Department declines to place the burden of proof on respondents to prove non-responsibility because the purpose of Title IX is to ensure that the recipient, not the parties, bears responsibility to draw accurate conclusions about whether sexual harassment has occurred in the recipient's education program or activity. Title IX obligates recipients, not individual students or employees, to operate education programs or activities free from sex discrimination, so it is the recipient's burden to gather relevant evidence and carry the burden of proof.

While the Department acknowledges the Federal district court decision cited by a commenter for the proposition that courts do not require a presumption of non-responsibility in Title IX proceedings, neither the Federal district court, nor the Sixth Circuit on appeal of that case, disapproved of a recipient applying a presumption of non-responsibility in a Title IX case or suggested that such a presumption would be constitutionally problematic; rather, the district court's opinion held that the recipient's alleged failure to provide such a presumption (even if true) would not amount to a due process deprivation under the U.S. Constitution.[1070] On appeal, the Sixth Circuit did not address the presumption of non-responsibility issue at all, and noted that it appeared the recipient placed the burden of proof on the itself (not on either party), a practice that was constitutionally sound [1071] and a requirement the final regulations impose on recipients in § 106.45(b)(5)(i).

Additionally, the Department is not persuaded by the commenter's citation to Mathews v. Eldridge, a U.S. Supreme Court case which set forth a three-part balancing test for determining the amount of process due to meet the basic requirements of providing notice and meaningful opportunity to be heard in particular situations and held that an evidentiary hearing is not required prior to the Social Security Administration's termination of social security benefits (in part because the basic due process requirements of notice and meaningful opportunity to be heard were met when an evidentiary hearing was available before a termination decision became final).[1072] The Mathews Court did not address the issue of whether a presumption is appropriate in an administrative proceeding and is inapposite on that particular point. As noted in the ''Role of Due Process in the Grievance Process'' section of this preamble, the Department believes that the § 106.45 grievance process is consistent with constitutional due process requirements and serves important policy purposes with respect to the fairness, accuracy, and perception of legitimacy of Title IX grievance processes.

False Allegations

Comments: Many commenters cited statistics that most people who report sexual assault are telling the truth, so a presumption of non-responsibility does not reflect reality. Several commenters urged the Department not to require recipients to presume that the respondent is not responsible, since they say that statistics show that most respondents are guilty. Numerous commenters asserted that the rate of false reporting of sexual assault is between two to ten percent.[1073] Other commenters asserted that 95 percent of sexual assault reports to the police are true.[1074] Commenters asserted that since data collection began in 1989, there are only 52 cases where men have been exonerated after being falsely convicted of sexual assault while in the same period, 790 men were exonerated for murder.[1075]

Commenters argued that all false accusations, wrongful expulsions, suspensions, punishments, and undue burdens levied against respondents still do not add up to the overwhelming numbers of victims, so any provision that makes it harder for victims to prevail only serves to harm a greater number (of victims) in an attempt to protect a very small number (of falsely accused respondents), leading to greater unequal access to education for victims. Commenters argued that very few respondents who are found guilty are expelled, and therefore respondents are usually not in danger of losing their access to educational opportunities, so a wrongful result adverse to a respondent is not as consequential as a wrongful result adverse to a complainant.

Other commenters argued that a presumption against responsibility is not needed because it is easy to identify patterns of individuals who file false accusations, because almost all false accusers have ''a history of bizarre fabrications or criminal fraud.'' [1076] Commenters stated that false accusations are unusually dramatic, involving gang rape, a gun or a knife, or violent attacks from strangers resulting in severe injuries.

Other commenters supported the presumption by asserting that false allegations do occur, and with more regularity than other commenters claim. Commenters cited the incidence of numerous lawsuits filed by students claiming they had been falsely accused,[1077] arguing that the prevalence of these lawsuits shows that many respondents, mostly young men, have been falsely accused and suspended or expelled from school under procedures that lacked fairness and reliability, often resulting in a respondent de facto being required to try to prove innocence. Commenters referred to high-profile campus sexual assault situations that commenters argued demonstrate the fact that false rape accusations do occur and damage respondents caught in systems that prejudge them without any benefit of being presumed innocent. Commenters argued that the frequency of false accusations is not as low as other commenters have claimed because studies examining the rate of false accusations only count accusations proven to be false, and do not count accusations dismissed for lack of evidence. One commenter shared details of the commenter's own research finding that 53 percent of sexual assault allegations were false, which the commenter argued is much higher than the ''2–10%'' statistic relied on by many victim advocates; [1078] the commenter argued that the 53 percent number is more accurate because it counted ''not responsible'' determinations as ''false accusations.''

As Defendants correctly argue in their brief, ''[o]utside the criminal law area, where special concerns attend, the locus of the burden of persuasion is normally not an issue of Federal constitutional moment.''). This does not imply that a presumption of non-responsibility would be problematic under a constitutional analysis.

One commenter asserted that high-conflict divorce proceedings take into account the reality that spite plays a role in some parties' negotiations and litigation strategies, but many people seem to believe sexual harassment allegations are almost entirely free of such distorting motives.

Discussion: The Department is not persuaded by commenters who argued that we should remove the presumption of non-responsibility from the final regulations because of studies showing that many, or even the vast majority, of allegations of sexual assault are true. Statistical findings can be instructive but not dispositive, and statistics cannot by themselves justify or rationalize procedural protections in a process designed to determine the truth of particular allegations involving specific individuals.[1079] Even if only two to ten percent of rape allegations are false or unfounded, the Department believes that statistical generalizations must not compel conclusions about the truth of particular allegations because without careful assessment of the facts of each particular situation it is not be possible to know whether the respondent is one of the 90 to 98 percent who statistically are ''guilty'' or among the two to ten percent who are statistically ''innocent.'' [1080]

Similarly, whether respondents are expelled at low rates or high rates, the final regulations are concerned with ensuring that the determination regarding responsibility is reliable and perceived as legitimate. For reasons described elsewhere in this preamble, the Department does not require any particular disciplinary sanctions against respondents, because these Title IX regulations are focused on requiring remedies for victims, leaving disciplinary decisions to recipients' discretion. For similar reasons, the Department declines to adopt a premise that most false allegations are ''easy to identify'' because even if research has identified certain patterns, common features, or motives for false allegations, it is not possible to assess the veracity of a complainant's specific allegations, or an individual complainant's motive, based on generalizations. Therefore, procedural rules designed for fairness and accuracy cannot be based on statistics or studies about what kind of allegations tend to be false. The Department disagrees that all determinations of non-responsibility are fairly characterized as involving a false or unfounded allegation; as numerous commenters have pointed out, an allegation may be true and lack sufficient evidence to meet a standard of evidence proving responsibility, or an allegation may be inaccurate but not intentionally falsified. The final regulations add § 106.71(b) cautioning recipients that punishing a party ostensibly for making false statements during a grievance process may constitute unlawful retaliation unless the recipient has concluded that a party made a bad faith materially false statement and that conclusion is not based solely on the determination regarding responsibility. This provision acknowledges the reality that a complainant's allegations may not have been false even where the ultimate determination is that the respondent is not responsible and/or that the complainant may not have acted subjectively in bad faith (and conversely, that a respondent may not have made false, or subjectively bad faith, denials even where the respondent is found responsible).

The presumption of non-responsibility is not designed to protect ''a few'' falsely accused respondents at the expense of ''the many'' sexual harassment victims; the presumption is designed to improve the accuracy and legitimacy of the outcome in each individual formal complaint of sexual harassment to prevent injustice to any complainant or any respondent.

Changes: Section 106.71(b) states that charging an individual with a code of conduct violation for making a bad faith materially false statement during a grievance process is not retaliation so long as that conclusion is not based solely on the determination regarding responsibility.

Inaccurate Findings of Non-Responsibility

Comments: Commenters argued that, in a misguided attempt to shield falsely accused people, the presumption of non-responsibility will allow assailants to go unpunished, which will further traumatize and disempower victims. Commenters argued that the presumption would allow more sexual harassment perpetrators to escape responsibility because it can be difficult to prove sexual assault, and evidence is frequently scant or based heavily on testimony alone so overcoming a presumption is yet another unfair obstacle for survivors to receive justice.

Commenters argued that, for those schools that employ a clear and convincing evidence standard, complainants will be more likely to lose the case, a result compounded by the presumption of non-responsibility. Commenters argued that abusive people will be found not responsible more often, making campuses less safe and increasing the number of sexual assaults on campuses. Another commenter argued that the presumption ensures that only the most egregious cases of sexual assault will be punished, which is unjust for many women.

Some commenters disagreed with the presumption, asserting that it requires fact-finding doctrines used in criminal law proceedings. Commenters expressed concern that, if schools handle complaints of sexual assault the same way law enforcement handles them, most complaints will not be pursued. One commenter asserted that 69 percent of survivors have experienced police officers discouraging them from filing a report and one-third of survivors have experienced police refusing to take their reports.[1081]

Commenters argued that the presumption is in tension with § 106.45(b)(1)(ii), which states that ''credibility determinations may not be based on a person's status as a complainant'' or ''respondent.''

One commenter asserted that the presumption would not work for medical schools, because medical students frequently experience sexual harassment or assault from patients or visitors, and medical schools do not have the authority to compel them to participate in investigatory interviews or live hearings.[1082]

Discussion: As applied under these final regulations, in the context of a Title IX grievance process, the presumption does not operate to let ''guilty'' respondents go free. While the presumption is based on a similar principle animating the presumption of innocence in criminal law, the § 106.45 grievance process generally, including the presumption under § 106.45(b)(1)(iv), does not mirror criminal law protections or mimic criminal courts. As discussed below, the presumption of non-responsibility reinforces that the burden of proof remains on the recipient, not on either party, and reinforces application of the standard of evidence, which under the final regulations must be lower than the criminal standard of beyond a reasonable doubt.

The Department disagrees that the final regulations require schools to handle reports or formal complaints of sexual assault the same way law enforcement handles them. Recipients are prohibited from showing deliberate indifference towards sexual harassment complainants, including by offering supporting measures to complainants irrespective of whether a formal complaint is ever filed, and under these final regulations recipients are obligated to investigate formal complaints, unlike law enforcement where officers and prosecutors generally have discretion to decline to investigate and prosecute. Further, law enforcement and criminal prosecutors gather evidence under a burden to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, but the final regulations place a burden on recipients to meet a burden of proof that shows a respondent responsible measured against a lower standard of evidence.[1083]

The Department is unpersuaded by commenters who asserted that the presumption will make campuses more dangerous because it will chill reporting or prevent recipients from punishing and expelling offenders from campuses because § 106.45 is too similar to criminal procedures. A presumption of non-responsibility need not chill or deter reporting of sexual harassment, because reporting under the final regulations leaves complainants autonomy over whether to seek supportive measures or also participate in a grievance process, and because a fair process with procedures rooted in principles of due process provides assurance that the outcome of a grievance process (when a complainant or Title IX Coordinator decides to initiate a grievance process) is reliable and viewed as legitimate.

Refraining from treating a respondent as responsible until conclusion of the grievance process does not make it more difficult to hold a respondent responsible or prevent implementation of supportive measures for a complainant. To the extent that commenters are advocating for latitude for recipients to impose interim suspensions or expulsions, the Department believes that without a fair, reliable process the recipient cannot know whether it has interim-expelled a respondent who is actually responsible for the allegations, or a respondent who is not responsible. However, the Department reiterates that § 106.44(c) allows emergency removals of respondents prior to conclusion of a grievance process (or even where no grievance process is pending), thus protecting the safety of a recipient's community where an immediate threat exists.

Because the standard of evidence is lower in the Title IX grievance process (recipients must select and apply either the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard) than in a criminal proceeding (beyond a reasonable doubt), the presumption in § 106.45(b)(1)(iv) does not convert the standard of evidence to the criminal standard (beyond a reasonable doubt). Under the § 106.45 grievance process, the § 106.45(b)(1)(iv) presumption ensures that recipients correctly apply the standard of evidence selected by each recipient, but no recipient is permitted to select the criminal ''beyond a reasonable doubt'' standard.[1084] Thus, the presumption helps to ensure that the recipient does not treat a respondent as responsible until conclusion of the grievance process, and to reinforce a recipient's proper application of the standard of evidence the recipient has selected [1085] without converting the Title IX grievance process to a criminal court proceeding. The presumption does not make it more difficult to hold a respondent responsible, because the presumption reinforces, but does not change, the burden of proof that rests on the recipient and the obligation to appropriately apply the recipient's selected standard of evidence in reaching a determination regarding responsibility to decide if the recipient's burden of proof has been met. The presumption will not result in assailants going unpunished; a perpetrator of sexual harassment proved responsible for the alleged conduct may be punished at the recipient's discretion, and these final regulations require the recipient to effectively implement remedies for the complainant where a respondent is found to be responsible.[1086]

The structure of the fact-finding process, including the presumption, prevents recipients from acting on an assumption that a particular complainant is (or is not) truthful; similarly, recipients may not look to the presumption as an excuse to ''believe'' or find credible, the respondent and to [1085] Because the Department has determined that the preponderance of the evidence standard is the lowest possible standard of evidence that a recipient may select for a § 106.45 grievance process, the presumption of non-responsibility's function of ensuring proper application of the standard of evidence is particularly important where a recipient has selected the preponderance of the evidence standard, to ensure that in cases where the evidence is in equipoise (i.e., ''50/50'') the result is a determination of non-responsibility. E.g., Vern R. Walker, Preponderance, Probability, and Warranted Factfinding, 62 Brooklyn L. Rev. 1075, 1076 (1996) (noting that the traditional formulation of the preponderance of the evidence standard by courts and legal scholars is that the party with the burden of persuasion must prove that a proposition is more probably true than false meaning a probability of truth greater than 50 percent); Neil B. Cohen, The Gatekeeping Role in Civil Litigation and the Abdication of Legal Values in Favor of Scientific Values, 33 Seton Hall L. Rev. 943, 954–56 (2003) (noting that the preponderance of the evidence standard applied in civil litigation results in the plaintiff losing the case where the plaintiff's and defendant's positions are ''in equipoise'' i.e., where the evidence presented makes the case ''too close to call'').

do so would violate § 106.45(b)(1)(ii). Thus, the Department disagrees with commenters who argue that the presumption contradicts § 106.45(b)(1)(ii) which requires that recipients may not make credibility determinations based on a party's status as a complainant or respondent. The presumption in § 106.45(b)(1)(iv) reinforces the obligation in § 106.45(b)(1)(ii) to refrain from drawing inferences about credibility based on a party's status as a complainant or respondent.

Nothing in the final regulations, including the presumption of non-responsibility, prevents recipients who are medical schools from offering supportive measures to medical students who allege that hospital patients or visitors are sexually harassing them. Section 106.30 defining ''supportive measures'' provides that the recipient may offer such measures either before or after the filing of a formal complaint or where no formal complaint has been filed, for the purpose of restoring the complainant's access to the education program without unreasonably burdening the respondent. The Department cannot comment more specifically as to what supportive measures might be reasonably available to preserve a medical student's equal access and avoid unreasonably burdening a respondent who is a patient or visitor, because each case requires the recipient's independent review and judgment. Where the respondent is a patient or visitor to the recipient's campus or facility and the recipient thus lacks an employment or enrollment relationship with the respondent, a recipient has discretion under § 106.45(b)(3)(ii) to dismiss a formal complaint where the respondent is not enrolled or employed by the recipient; or, also in the recipient's discretion, the recipient may investigate and adjudicate a formal complaint against such a respondent and, for example, issue a no-trespass order following a determination regarding responsibility. Regardless of how a recipient exercises its discretion with respect to formal complaints against respondents over whom a recipient lacks disciplinary authority, medical schools may still comply with the requirements in these final regulations to respond to sexual harassment that occurs in the recipient's education program or activity.

Changes: None.

Recipients Should Apply Dual Presumptions or No Presumption

Comments: Commenters stated that § 106.45(b)(1)(iv) equates to a presumption that the complainant is lying, or a presumption that the alleged harassment never occurred. Commenters asserted if presumptions exist, the provision should direct the recipient to presume, in addition to the respondent's presumption of non-responsibility, that the complainant is credible and making a good faith complaint. One commenter asserted that the Department should provide training to address bias against complainants.

Commenters argued that, because the grievance process is not a criminal proceeding, there should be no presumption in favor of either party. Commenters argued that investigators should have no presumption—either in favor or against either party—when performing their fact-finding duties. Commenters argued that it is unfair to complainants to start an investigation with a presumption of the respondent's innocence, just as it would be unfair to the respondent to start with a presumption of guilt. Commenters argued that in civil and administrative proceedings, both parties start on equal footing in the process with a blank slate in front of the decision-maker, and there is no reason why Title IX proceedings should not treat the parties equally in this manner. Commenters argued that while criminal proceedings give defendants a presumption of innocence, State and Federal victims' rights laws balance even that presumption of innocence to ensure victims are treated fairly. Commenters argued that a civil case requires that the victim and perpetrator appear as equals [1087] and argued that a Title IX investigation should treat both parties equally regarding credibility, with no presumption of innocence or presumption of guilt. One commenter argued that the presumption makes no sense in an educational environment because the complainant and respondent are tied together because of their relationship to the institution, which is different from the relationship between defendants and the government in criminal matters, and the § 106.45(b)(1)(iv) presumption will negatively impact every complainant's education because the complainant will be assumed to be lying just by filing a complaint.

Commenters asserted that currently there is no presumption of non-responsibility for respondents in other student misconduct proceedings, such as theft, cheating, plagiarism, and even physical assault. Commenters argued that if the Department believes such a presumption is important in sexual misconduct cases, then it should require the presumption in all student misconduct cases for the sake of uniformity.

Discussion: The Department declines to adopt commenters' recommendations that recipients should presume that complainants are credible. If the presumption of non-responsibility meant assuming that the respondent is credible, then the Department would agree that such a presumption would be unfair to complainants and should be balanced by an equal presumption of credibility for complainants (or, more reasonably, no presumptions at all). However, the presumption of non-responsibility is not a presumption about the respondent's credibility, believability, or truthfulness, and § 106.45(b)(1)(ii) requires recipients not to make credibility determinations based on a party's status as complainant or respondent. A critical feature of a fair grievance process is that Title IX personnel refrain from drawing conclusions or making assumptions about either party's credibility or truthfulness until conclusion of the grievance process; therefore, the Department declines to impose a presumption that either party (or both parties) are credible or truthful. Because the presumption of non-responsibility is not a presumption that a respondent is credible, there is no need for a presumption specific to complainants to balance or counteract the presumption of non-responsibility.[1088] The [1087] Commenters cited: The National Center for Victims of Crime, ''Criminal and Civil Justice,'' http://victimsofcrime.org/media/reporting-on-child-sexual-abuse/criminal-and-civil-justice, for this proposition.

[1088] A presumption specific to a complainant that corresponds to the presumption of a respondent's non-responsibility might, hypothetically, be a presumption that the complainant is not responsible—but such a presumption simply does not apply to a complainant, because a complainant by definition is not alleged to be responsible for misconduct. Alternatively, a presumption specific to a complainant analogous to the presumption of non-responsibility might be that the complainant must be treated as a victim of the respondent's conduct until conclusion of the grievance process (because, as explained above, the presumption of non-responsibility operates to treat a respondent as ''not a perpetrator'' until conclusion of the grievance process, subject to the § 106.44(c) and § 106.44(d) exceptions for emergency removals and administrative leave for employee-respondents). However, the Department does not believe such a presumption would operate to protect complainants in any manner not already provided for in the final regulations. Section 106.44(a) already requires the recipient essentially to treat a complainant as a victim in need of services in the aftermath of suffering sexual harassment (by offering supportive measures and engaging in an interactive discussion with the complainant to arrive at helpful supportive measures to preserve the complainant's equal educational access) even before, or without, a fact-finding process that has determined that the respondent victimized the complainant. Moreover, the grievance process effectively requires a complainant to be treated as a victim in two specific presumption of non-responsibility does not assume, or allow recipients to act as though, complainants are lying; under the final regulations, recipients must not prejudge the facts at issue, must not draw inferences about credibility based on a party's status as a complainant or respondent, and must objectively evaluate all relevant evidence to reach a determination regarding responsibility.

The procedural rights granted to both parties under § 106.45 ensure that complainants and respondents have equal opportunities to meaningfully participate in putting forth their views about the allegations and their desired case outcome, an essential requirement for due process even in a civil (noncriminal) setting.[1089] The Department disagrees that in civil (as opposed to criminal) trials the plaintiff and defendant ''appear as equals'' in every regard, because even in civil trials the burden of proof generally rests on the plaintiff to prove allegations, not on the defendant to prove non-liability.[1090] Thus, while parties in civil litigation (and under § 106.45) have equal rights to participate in the process (for example, by gathering and presenting evidence), a burden of proof must still be met. The final regulations ensure that neither party bears the burden of proof (which remains on the recipient) yet give both parties equal procedural rights throughout the grievance process. The presumption does not create inequality between the complainant and respondent; the presumption reinforces the recipient's burden of proof and correct application of the standard of evidence, neither of which burdens or disadvantages the complainant.

The Department notes that § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) not only requires Title IX personnel to serve without bias for or against complainants or respondents, but also requires training for Title IX personnel, expressly to avoid bias for or against complainants or respondents generally or for or against an individual complainant or respondent. Recipients have discretion as to the content and approaches of such training so long as the requirements of § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) are met.

A presumption of non-responsibility reinforces placement of the burden of proof, proper application of the standard of evidence, and fair treatment of an accused person prior to adjudication of responsibility. These features of a fair grievance process may be beneficial to the legitimacy and reliability of outcomes of non-sexual harassment student misconduct proceedings. However, these final regulations focus only on effectuating Title IX's non-discrimination mandate by improving the perception and reality that recipients' Title IX proceedings reach fair, accurate outcomes; these regulations do not impose requirements on recipients for grievance proceedings other than for Title IX sexual harassment.

Changes: None.

The Adversarial Nature of the Grievance Process

Comments: Commenters asserted that universities already treat both parties equitably and the presumption in § 106.45(b)(1)(iv) escalates the adversarial nature of Title IX proceedings; commenters argued this will raise the financial and emotional toll the grievance process will have on both complainants and respondents. Commenters argued that the proposed regulations ask a university to act as a judicial system, placing an undue burden on the educational system and imposing an unprecedented amount of control over a school's—especially a private school's—ability to develop and implement disciplinary processes in a way that best serves its community and upholds its values, which often include using codes of conduct to educate students rather than be punitive. One commenter opposed the presumption because recipients already train staff and faculty to serve neutrally, bearing in mind the educational context in student misconduct cases, because the student is paying to be in an educational environment, not a prison system. One commenter warned that the presumption of non-responsibility would create an ''inaccessibility to justice.''

Other commenters supported the presumption of non-responsibility, arguing that Title IX proceedings are often highly contested, yet school proceedings are biased against the accused; commenters cited articles showing that over 150 lawsuits have been filed arising from fundamental unfairness in schools' Title IX proceedings.[1091] Commenters argued that a presumption of non-responsibility is essential because recipients have denied respondents the right to know the allegations against them or the identity of the person accusing them, and that respondents have been repeatedly denied the ability to question the complainant, submit exculpatory evidence, or have their witnesses interviewed by the recipient. Commenters argued that respondents have sued recipients for expelling them or finding them responsible without first giving them procedural protections, and that some courts have agreed that some recipients committed due process or fairness violations. One commenter shared information from a university's website promoting adherence to the public awareness campaign ''Start by Believing,'' [1092] which the commenter argued shows the university's bias against accused students. Commenters argued that college environments are highly politicized and college provisions that apply for complainants' benefit: § 106.45(b)(6)(i)–(ii) provides rape shield protection for complainants—but not respondents—against questions and evidence inquiring into the complainant's prior sexual behavior; and § 106.45(b)(6)(i) allows either party to request that a live hearing (including cross-examination) occurs in separate rooms. While the latter provision applies on its face to both parties, the provision is responsive to public comment informing the Department that complainants already traumatized by sexual violence likely will be traumatized by coming face-to-face with the respondent; no such concerns about the traumatic effect of personal confrontation were raised on behalf of respondents. Thus, where appropriate, the grievance process takes into account the unique needs of complainants, in ways that the Department believes serve Title IX's non-discrimination mandate by protecting complainants as though every complainant has been victimized, without unfairness to the respondent. A presumption of non-responsibility does not deprive a complainant of the protections given solely to complainants under § 106.44(a) and § 106.45, nor deprive a complainant of the benefits of the robust procedural rights given equally to both parties during the grievance process.

[1089] E.g., Niki Kuckes, Civil Due Process, Criminal Due Process, 25 Yale Law & Pol. Rev. 1, 10–11 (2006) (due process in civil settings ''places central importance on the participation of the affected party in decision-making. Ex parte procedures are the exception, while participatory procedures are the rule. Notice and an opportunity to be heard is, obviously, the principle without which a participatory model of justice cannot work effectively. Unless a party is notified that there is a controversy, it cannot participate in decision-making; unless a party has the opportunity for a hearing, it cannot present its side of the controversy; and unless the decision-maker hears from both parties, there cannot be a meaningful ruling. This is the adversary system's vision of justice.'').

[1090] E.g., Dale A. Nance, Civility and the Burden of Proof, 17 Harv. J. of L. & Pub. Pol'y 647, 659 (1994) (in civil litigation ''it remains true that the burden is placed, in the vast majority of contexts, on the person or institution claiming that someone has breached a duty serious enough to warrant legal recognition.''). We reiterate that the final regulations, § 106.45(b)(1)(i), place the burden squarely on the recipient—not on the complainant—to prove that a respondent has committed sexual harassment.

administrators and faculty are not objective fact-finders, and a presumption of non-responsibility helps counteract that lack of objectivity.

Discussion: The Department disagrees that the presumption of non-responsibility increases the adversarial nature of Title IX proceedings; Title IX proceedings are often inherently adversarial, due to the need to resolve contested factual allegations. The Department understands commenters' concerns that an adversarial process may take an emotional toll on participants, and the final regulations encourage provision of supportive measures to both parties and give both parties an equal right to select an advisor of choice to assist the parties during a grievance process. The presumption of non-responsibility does not magnify the adversarial nature of the grievance process; rather, the presumption reinforces the recipient's burden of proof, proper application of the standard of evidence, and how a respondent is treated pending the outcome of the grievance process. The Department disagrees that the presumption will lead to ''inaccessibility'' of justice; rather, complainants will benefit from increased legitimacy of recipient determinations when respondents are found responsible, while respondents will benefit from assurance that a recipient cannot treat the respondent as though responsibility has been determined until the conclusion of a fair grievance process. The § 106.45 grievance process, and the final regulations as a whole, impose an obligation on recipients to remain impartial toward parties whose views about the allegations are adverse to each other. To the extent that commenters' concerns about an adversarial process reflect concern that financial inequities can affect the process (for example, where one party can afford to hire an attorney to further the party's interests and the other party cannot afford an attorney), the final regulations permit, but do not require, advisors to be attorneys, allow recipients to limit the active participation of advisors significantly, with the exception of conducting cross-examination at a live hearing in postsecondary institutions,[1093] and do not preclude recipients from offering both parties legal representation.[1094] This approach reflects the reality that recipients are not courts, yet do need to apply a fair, truth-seeking process to resolve factual allegations of Title IX sexual harassment.

The Department recognizes that some recipients expressed concerns that the presumption of non-responsibility, in conjunction with other provisions in § 106.45, requires educational institutions to mimic courts of law. The Department acknowledges, and the final regulations reflect, that recipients' purpose is to educate, not to act as courts. The § 106.45 grievance process is designed for implementation by non-lawyer recipient officials, and the final regulations do not intrude on a recipient's discretion to use disciplinary sanctions as educational tools of behavior modification rather than, or in addition to, punitive measures. However, to effectuate Title IX's non-discrimination mandate, recipients must accurately resolve allegations of sexual harassment in order to identify and address sex discrimination in the recipient's education program or activity. The Department believes the presumption of non-responsibility is important to ensure that recipients do not treat respondents as responsible until conclusion of the grievance process and to reinforce the recipient's burden of proof and proper application of the standard of evidence, and these features will improve the legitimacy and reliability of the outcomes of recipients' Title IX grievance processes.

Changes: None.

Supportive Measures

Comments: Several commenters sought clarification as to whether the presumption in § 106.45(b)(1)(iv) would preclude a recipient from taking interim or emergency actions as dictated by individual circumstances when needed to ensure safety. For example, if a respondent is presumed not to be responsible for stalking a complainant until the end of the grievance process, commenters asked how a recipient could take effective measures to ensure that the respondent will not stalk the complainant prior to the conclusion of the grievance proceeding. Commenters asserted that the presumption appeared to require the recipient to remove the complainant from dorms and classes rather than the respondent, and that the presumption would curtail the ability of recipients to remove harassers and abusers from dorms and classes, which will lead to more sexual assaults because research indicates that most perpetrators are repeat offenders.[1095] Commenters argued that the presumption may discourage schools from providing crucial supportive measures to complainants to avoid being perceived as punishing respondents.[1096]

Commenters argued that the proposed rules not only give respondents a presumption of innocence but also require recipients to provide supportive measures to respondents, constituting unprecedented concern with the well-being of accused harassers above the interests of victims.

Discussion: The § 106.30 definition of ''supportive measures'' permits recipients to provide either party, or both parties, individualized services, without fee or charge, before or after filing a formal complainant, or where no formal complaint has been filed. Section 106.44(a) obligates a recipient to offer supportive measures to every complainant, by engaging in an interactive process by which the Title IX Coordinator contacts the complainant, discusses available supportive measures, considers the complainant's wishes with respect to supportive measures, and explains to the complainant the option for filing a formal complaint. Title IX Coordinators are responsible for the effective implementation of supportive measures, and under revised § 106.45(b)(10) if a recipient's response to sexual harassment does not include providing supportive measures to a complainant the recipient must specifically document why that response was not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances (for example, because the complainant did not wish to receive supportive measures or refused to discuss supportive measures with the Title IX Coordinator when the Title IX Coordinator contacted the complainant to have such a discussion). Thus, unless a complainant does not desire supportive measures (i.e., refuses the offer of supportive measures), [1093] Section 106.45(b)(5)(iv); § 106.45(b)(6)(i).

[1094] The Department realizes that only a fraction of postsecondary institutions currently offer to provide both parties in a grievance proceeding with legal representation, but such an option remains available to recipients who choose to address disparity with respect to the financial ability of parties to hire legal representation in the recipient's educational community. E.g., Kristen N. Jozkowski & Jacquelyn D. Wiersma-Mosley, The Greek System: How Gender Inequality and Class Privilege Perpetuate Rape Culture, 66 Fam. Relations 1 (2017) (noting that only about three percent of colleges and universities provide victims with legal representation and arguing that colleges and universities should provide free legal representation to both complainants and respondents in campus sexual assault proceedings).

[1095] Commenters cited: David Lisak & Paul Miller, Repeat Rape and Multiple Offending Among Undetected Rapists, 17 Violence & Victims 1 (2002), for the proposition that a majority of ''undetected rapists'' were repeat rapists and undetected repeat rapists committed an average of 5.8 rapes each.

[1096] Commenters cited: Michael C. Dorf, What Does a Presumption of Non-Responsibility Mean in a Civil Context, Dorf On Law (Nov. 28, 2018), http://www.dorfonlaw.org/2018/11/what-does-presumption-of-non.html.

complainants must receive supportive measures designed to restore or preserve the complainant's equal educational access, regardless of whether a grievance process is ever initiated. There is no corresponding obligation to offer supportive measures to respondents; rather, recipients may provide supportive measures to respondents and under § 106.45(b)(1)(ix) the recipient's grievance process must describe the range of supportive measures available to complainants and respondents.

The presumption of non-responsibility, which operates throughout a grievance process, does not prohibit the recipient from providing a complainant with supportive measures, but does reinforce the provision in the § 106.30 definition of ''supportive measures'' that supportive measures are designed to restore or preserve equal access to education ''without unreasonably burdening the other party'' including measures designed to protect a complainant's safety or deter sexual harassment (which includes stalking), but supportive measures cannot be punitive or disciplinary. This does not bar all measures that place any burden on a respondent, but only those that ''unreasonably burden'' a respondent (or a complainant). Thus, changing a respondent's class schedule, or forbidding the respondent from communicating with the complainant, may be an appropriate supportive measure for a complainant if such measures do not ''unreasonably burden'' the respondent, and such measures do not violate the presumption of non-responsibility.

To the extent that commenters' concern is that current Department guidance affords recipients more discretion to impose interim measures that in fact do constitute disciplinary actions against the respondent (for example, interim suspensions), the Department has reconsidered that approach and, based on public comments on the NPRM, concluded that the non-discrimination mandate of Title IX is better served by the framework in the final regulations than the approach taken in guidance documents. With respect to disciplinary or punitive actions taken prior to an adjudication factually establishing a respondent's responsibility for sexual harassment, the final regulations circumscribe a recipient's discretion to treat a respondent as though accusations are true before the accusations have been proved.[1097] When applied in the context of these final regulations, the presumption of non-responsibility's reinforcement of the notion that a person accused should not be treated as though accusations are true until the accusations have been proved increases the legitimacy of a recipient's response to sexual harassment, while preserving every complainant's right to supportive measures designed to maintain a complainant's equal educational access and protect a complainant's safety. This approach directly effectuates Title IX's non-discrimination mandate by improving the fairness and accuracy of a recipient's response to sexual harassment occurring in the recipient's education programs or activities.

The Department understands commenters' concerns that restricting a recipient's ability to impose interim discipline poses a risk that perpetrators may repeat an offense because they remain on campus while a grievance process is pending; however, even in situations that do not constitute the kind of immediate threat justifying an emergency removal under § 106.44(c), there are supportive measures short of disciplinary actions that a recipient may take to protect the safety of parties and deter sexual harassment, such as a no-contact order prohibiting communication with the complainant, supervising the respondent, and informing the respondent of the recipient's policy against sexual harassment.[1098]

[1097] The final regulations prohibit a recipient from taking disciplinary action, or other action that does not meet the definition of a supportive measure, against a respondent without following a grievance process that complies with § 106.45. § 106.44(a); § 106.45(b)(1). Through an informal resolution process (which is authorized under § 106.45) a recipient may impose disciplinary sanctions against a respondent without concluding an investigation or adjudication. § 106.45(b)(9). An exception to the requirement not to impose punitive or disciplinary action until conclusion of a grievance process is § 106.44(c), permitting a recipient to remove a respondent from an education program or activity in an emergency situation whether or not a grievance process has been concluded or is even pending. Supportive measures designed to restore or preserve a complainant's equal access to education, protect parties' safety, and/or deter sexual harassment, may be imposed even where such measures burden a respondent, so long as the burden is not unreasonable. § 106.30 (defining ''supportive measures''). Thus, the final regulations are premised on the principle that a recipient must not treat a respondent as responsible prior to an adjudication finding the respondent responsible, yet that principle is not absolute and leave recipients with the ability (and, judged under the deliberate indifference standard, the obligation) to protect and support complainants and respond to emergency threat situations, without unduly, prematurely punishing a respondent based on accusations that have not been factually proved.

[1098] E.g., Williams v. Bd. of Regents of Univ. Sys. of Ga., 477 F.3d 1282, 1296 (11th Cir. 2007) (pointing to the recipient's failure to supervise the respondent or inform the respondent of the recipient's expectations of behavior under the recipient's sexual harassment policy as evidence of the recipient's deliberate indifference that subjected the complainant to sexual harassment).

Changes: None.

Miscellaneous Concerns

Comments: At least one commenter asked the Department to add at the end of the presumption provision the language ''. . . respondent is not responsible for the alleged conduct until a determination regarding responsibility is made at the conclusion of the grievance process or any subsequent litigation.'' Commenters asked the Department to provide the respondent with a right to remain silent, since the respondent's statements during any investigation or hearing could be used against the respondent at a criminal trial. One commenter recommended inserting the following language: ''The recipient bears the burden of demonstrating that the respondent is responsible for the alleged conduct and may not infer responsibility based solely on the respondent declining to present testimony, evidence, or witnesses in response to a formal complaint.''

Another commenter urged the Department to add to § 106.45(b)(1)(iv) a sentence declaring that it is the obligation of the recipient to prove every element of every alleged offense before the accused student may be found responsible and punished for committing an alleged offense.

Discussion: The Department does not attempt to regulate procedures that apply in private lawsuits and so declines commenters' request that the Department require a recipient to abide by a presumption of non-responsibility until conclusion of ''any subsequent litigation.'' The recipient's obligation is to conclude a grievance process by reaching a determination regarding responsibility when presented with a formal complaint of sexual harassment under Title IX, whether or not litigation arises from the same allegations.

Section 106.6(d) provides that these regulations do not require a recipient to restrict any rights that would otherwise be protected from government action under the U.S. Constitution, which includes the Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination. To ensure that the determination regarding responsibility is reached in a manner that does not require violation of that constitutional right, we revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) in the final regulations to provide that a decision-maker cannot draw any inferences about the determination regarding responsibility based on a party's failure to appear at the hearing or answer cross-examination or other questions. While this applies equally to respondents and complainants, this modification addresses commenters' concerns that a respondent should not be found responsible solely because the respondent refused to provide self-incriminating statements. The Department declines to change § 106.45(b)(1)(iv) to add language about the recipient's burden to prove each element of an offense, because § 106.45(b)(5)(i) places the burden of proof on the recipient.

Changes: We revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) of the final regulations to provide that a decision-maker cannot draw any inferences about the determination regarding responsibility based on a party's failure to appear at the hearing or answer cross-examination or other questions.

Section 106.45(b)(1)(v) Reasonably Prompt Time Frames

Support

Comments: A number of commenters expressed support for this section. Some did not expand upon the reasons for their support. Others, primarily some college and university commenters, expressed particular support for eliminating the 60-day time frame contained in withdrawn Department guidance. Some commenters identified concerns with a 60-day time frame, such as asserting that: It does not reflect the complex nature of these cases, such as multiple parties, various witnesses, time to obtain evidence, and school breaks; it is arbitrary and hard to adhere to while providing due process for all; it interferes with the time parties need to provide evidence and to make their case; it has not been required by courts; and it increases the risks of decisions based on conjecture or gender or racial stereotypes. Other commenters contended that eliminating such a constrained timeline would be beneficial, by for instance allowing for more thorough investigations, collection of more evidence, and added accommodation of disabilities.

A number of the supportive commenters also noted support more generally for the NPRM's flexibility regarding the time to conclude Title IX investigations and extensions for good cause. Some emphasized that prompt resolution is important, but contended that various factors may delay proceedings (such as police investigations, witness availability, school breaks, faculty sabbaticals) and asserted that fairness demands thoroughness. According to these commenters, § 106.45(b)(1)(v) appropriately accounts for schools' unique attributes (for example, their size, population, location, or mission), recognizes that complex matters may not lend themselves to set deadlines, and acknowledges that delays may sometimes be necessary, especially with a concurrent criminal investigation. Likewise, some commenters expressed support for good cause extensions for a related criminal proceeding in the belief that students should not be forced to choose between participating in campus proceedings and giving up their right to silence in criminal proceedings.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the commenters' support for § 106.45(b)(1)(v) under which a recipient's grievance process must include reasonably prompt time frames for concluding the grievance process, including appeals and any informal resolution processes, with temporary delays and limited extensions of time frames permitted only for good cause. The Department agrees with commenters that this provision appropriately requires prompt resolution of a grievance process while leaving recipients flexibility to designate reasonable time frames and address situations that justify short-term delays or extensions. This is the same recommendation made in the 2001 Guidance, which advised recipients that grievance procedures should include ''Designated and reasonably prompt time frames for the major stages of the complaint process.'' [1099]

Changes: None.

Opposition—Lack of Specified Time Limit

Comments: Many commenters expressed opposition to § 106.45(b)(1)(v) because of concerns about the absence of specific time frames for completing investigations and adjudications, including appeals. Commenters asserted that schools could delay investigations indefinitely or for unspecified periods of time and that students might wait months or years for resolution of their complaint. Commenters identified a number of other drawbacks they felt would result from uncertain, indefinite time frames with possible delays. Commenters asserted that this provision would: Make it less likely that survivors will report, less likely parties will receive justice, and more likely that students will lose faith in the reporting process; eliminate the mechanism for discovering and correcting harassment as early and effectively as possible; result in inconsistent resolution time frames at different schools; and only further delay the already lengthy process to reach resolution of sexual misconduct cases (for example, long unexplained delays even under the prior guidance with a 60-day time frame). Some commenters noted other concerns about the proposed time frames and potential delays or extensions.

Commenters asserted that indefinite time frames and probable delays would create uncertainty and a longer process that would harm survivors' well-being, safety, and education, and subject them to unreasonable physical, mental, time, and cost demands. Some felt that the proposal would: Deny due process; exacerbate survivors' emotional distress; heighten the chances survivors would drop their cases or drop out of school as investigations drag on; increase risks of self-harm or suicide as delays might take too long for schools to provide prompt supports; prolong the period of survivors' exposure to their attackers; and add costs for counseling services or medical assistance, which would especially burden low-income students. Other commenters emphasized their belief that the indefinite time frames and delays would harm the mental health and education of both complainants and respondents, by adding uncertainty and stress for lengthy periods without resolution, exoneration, or closure. Other commenters expressed concerns about increasing safety risks to all students by allowing a hostile environment to continue unchecked, and assailants to harass, assault, or retaliate against their victims or others during the long waiting period. One commenter expressed concern that the NPRM would permit delays even when a respondent poses a clear threat to the campus community.

Some commenters contended that delays or extensions may result in: Information, memory, and witnesses being lost; less, lost, or corrupted evidence, including fewer witnesses who may no longer be available or on campus (for example, students or short-term staff); and parties who have left school or graduated impairing schools from investigating or resolving concerns. Other commenters believed that a lengthier process and delays would: Signal that schools do not care about the safety or education of victims; make it more likely that a victim will be identified or lose confidentiality; force survivors to rely on supportive measures for longer than they may be adequate or effective; allow a respondent's refusal to cooperate to delay a case indefinitely; permit recipients to place respondents on administrative leave to further delay an investigation; and particularly harm schools' short-term staff or contractors. A few commenters asserted that delays have increased in resolving Title IX cases since the Department withdrew the 2011 Dear Colleague Letter, and at least one commenter expressed concern that the Department failed to offer data that a 60-day time frame had compromised accuracy and fairness.

Discussion: The Department disagrees that this provision allows recipients to conduct grievance processes without specified time frames, or allows indefinite delays. This provision specifically requires a recipient's grievance process to include reasonably prompt time frames; thus, a recipient must resolve each formal complaint of sexual harassment according to the time frames the recipient has committed to in its grievance process. Any delays or extensions of the recipient's designated time frames must be ''temporary'' and ''limited'' and ''for good cause'' and the recipient must notify the parties of the reason for any such short-term delay or extension. This provision thus does not allow for open-ended or indefinite grievance processes.

Under existing regulations at 34 CFR 106.8(b), in effect since 1975, recipients have been required to ''adopt and publish grievance procedures providing for prompt and equitable resolution of student and employee complaints alleging'' sex discrimination. The final regulations require more of recipients than do existing regulations, because § 106.45(b)(1)(v) requires recipients to include ''reasonably prompt time frames'' in the recipient's grievance process, rather than simply ''providing for prompt'' resolution. Further, the final regulations specify that the time frames designated by the recipient must account for conclusion of the entire grievance process, including appeals and any informal resolutions processes. Thus, no avenue for handling a formal complaint of sexual harassment is subject to an open-ended time frame.

Any time frame included by the recipient must be ''reasonably prompt,'' where the reasonableness of the time frame is evaluated in the context of the recipient's operation of an education program or activity. The Department believes that conclusion of the grievance process must be reasonably prompt, because students (or employees) should not have to wait longer than necessary to know the resolution of a formal complaint of sexual harassment; any grievance process is difficult for both parties, and participating in such a process likely detracts from students' ability to focus on participating in the recipient's education program or activity. Furthermore, victims of sexual harassment are entitled to remedies to restore or preserve equal access to education, and while supportive measures should be implemented as appropriate designed to achieve the same ends while a grievance process is pending, remedies after a respondent is found responsible may consist of measures not permissible as supportive measures. Thus, prompt resolution of a formal complaint of sexual harassment is necessary to further Title IX's non-discrimination mandate. At the same time, grievance processes must be fair and lead to reliable outcomes, so that sexual harassment in a recipient's education program or activity is accurately identified and remedied. The final regulations prescribe procedures and protections throughout the § 106.45 grievance process that the Department has concluded are necessary to ensure fairness and accuracy. The Department believes that each recipient is in the best position to balance promptness with fairness and accuracy based on the recipient's unique attributes and the recipient's experience with its own student disciplinary proceedings, and thus requires recipients to include ''reasonably prompt time frames'' for conclusion of a grievance process that complies with these final regulations.

The Department acknowledges that withdrawn Department guidance referred to a 60-day time frame for sexual harassment complaints. For recipients who determine that 60 days represents a reasonable time frame under which that recipient can conclude a grievance process that complies with § 106.45, a recipient has discretion to include that time frame under the final regulations. For recipients who determine that a shorter or longer period of time represents the time frame under which the recipient can conclude a grievance process, the recipient has discretion to include that time frame. The Department emphasizes that what a recipient selects as a ''reasonable'' time frame is judged in the context of the recipient's obligation to provide students and employees with education programs and activities free from sex discrimination, so that the recipient's selection of time frames must reflect the goal of resolving a grievance process as quickly as possible while complying with the procedures set forth in § 106.45 that aim to ensure fairness and accuracy. Because the final regulations allow short-term delays and extensions for good cause, recipients need not base designated time frames on, for example, the most complex, time-consuming investigation that a formal complaint of sexual harassment might present. Rather, the recipient may select time frames under which the recipient is confident it can conclude the grievance process in most situations, knowing that case-specific complexities may be accounted for with factually justified short-term delays and extensions.

Commenters correctly noted that this provision allows different recipients to select different designated time frames and thus a grievance process may take longer at one school than at another. The Department believes that each recipient's commitment to a designated, reasonable time frame known to its students and employees,[1100] where each recipient has determined what time frame to designate by considering its own unique educational community and operations, is more effective than imposing a fixed time frame across all recipients because it results in each recipient being held accountable for complying with time frames the recipient has selected (and made known to its educational community), while ensuring that all recipients select time frames that are reasonably prompt.

The non-exhaustive list in § 106.45(b)(1)(v) of factors that may constitute good cause for short-term delays or extensions of the recipient's designated time frames relate to the fundamental fairness of the proceedings. Delays caused solely by administrative needs, for example, would be insufficient to satisfy this standard.[1101] Furthermore, even where good cause exists, the final regulations make clear that recipients may only delay the grievance process on a temporary basis for a limited time. A respondent (or other party, advisor, or witness) would not be able to indefinitely delay a Title IX proceeding by refusing to cooperate. While recipients must attempt to accommodate the schedules of parties and witnesses throughout the grievance [1100] Section 106.45(b)(1)(v) (requiring a recipient's grievance process to designate reasonably prompt time frames); § 106.8 (requiring recipients to notify students and employees (and others) of its non-discrimination policy and its grievance process for resolution of formal complaints of sexual harassment).

[1101] The Department notes that temporary delay of a hearing caused by a recipient's need to provide an advisor to conduct cross-examination on behalf of a party at a hearing as required under § 106.45(b)(6)(i) may constitute good cause rather than mere administrative convenience, although a recipient aware of that potential obligation ought to take affirmative steps to ascertain whether a party will require an advisor provided by the recipient or not, in advance of the hearing, so as not to delay the proceedings.

process in order to provide parties with a meaningful opportunity to exercise the rights granted to parties under these final regulations, it is the recipient's obligation to meet its own designated time frames, and the final regulations provide that a grievance process can proceed to conclusion even in the absence of a party or witness.

The Department understands commenters' concerns that the longer a grievance process is pending, the more risk there is of loss of information, evidence, and availability of witnesses. These concerns are addressed through requiring that a grievance process is concluded within a ''reasonably prompt'' time frame, yet in a manner that applies procedures designed to ensure fairness and accuracy. Administrative leave under § 106.44(d) of the final regulations would not preclude an investigation from proceeding; regardless of whether a party has been voluntarily or involuntarily separated from the recipient's campus, the recipient can provide for the party to return to participate in the grievance process, including with safety measures in place for the other parties and witnesses. Under § 106.45(b)(6)(i) a postsecondary institution has discretion to hold a live hearing virtually, or to allow any participant to participate remotely, using technology. Where a party refuses to participate, the recipient may still proceed with the grievance process (though the recipient must still send to a party who has chosen not to participate notices required under § 106.45; for instance, a written notice of the date, time, and location of a live hearing).

The Department disagrees that § 106.45(b)(1)(v) will jeopardize the safety of complainants or the educational environment, or that complainants will feel deterred from filing formal complainants because the grievance process might drag on indefinitely. As noted above, supportive measures designed to protect safety and deter sexual harassment are available during the pendency of the grievance process.[1102] Furthermore, under § 106.44(c) recipients may remove a respondent on an emergency basis without awaiting conclusion of a grievance process. As also noted above, the final regulations do not permit any recipient's grievance process to go on indefinitely.

[1102] Section 106.30 (defining ''supportive measures''); § 106.44(a) (requiring recipients to offer supportive measures to complainants, with or without the filing of a formal complaint).

With respect to a commenter's assertion that the Department did not provide data to show that the 60-day time frame has compromised accuracy and fairness, commenters on behalf of complainants and respondents have noted that the grievance process often takes too long, which may indicate that a 60-day time frame was not a reasonable expectation for recipients to conclude a fair process, and some comments on behalf of recipients expressed that many of the cases that go through a Title IX proceeding present complex facts that require more than 60 days for a recipient to conclude a fair process. For recipients who determine that 60 days (or less) is a reasonable time frame under which to conclude a fair process, recipients may designate such a time frame as part of their § 106.45 grievance process.

Changes: To ensure that reasonably prompt time frames are included for every stage of a grievance process, we have revised § 106.45(b)(1)(v) of the final regulations to apply the reasonably prompt time frame requirement to informal resolution processes, if recipients choose to offer them, and we have removed the phrase ''if the recipient offers an appeal'' because under the final regulations, § 106.45(b)(8), appeals are mandatory, not optional.

Effects on Recipients

Comments: Other commenters expressed opposition to § 106.45(b)(1)(v) because they believed it would weaken schools' accountability and incentives for prioritizing sexual harassment complaints and would increase the chances that reports are brushed under the rug or not promptly and appropriately handled. Some commenters noted concerns that the provision is too vague to be clear, effective, and enforceable, and would give schools too much leeway to decide what is reasonably prompt. Other commenters expressed concern that schools already have incentives to delay, such as to protect their reputations or resources, and so might drag out investigations until one or both parties graduate, a survivor drops the case, or until after a season ends or a major game is played, in cases involving athletes. A number of commenters called for set time frames for clearer expectations and accountability. One commenter felt that a set time frame would also leave schools less vulnerable to lawsuits or complaints.

Discussion: The Department does not believe that this provision perversely incentivizes recipients to sweep allegations of sexual harassment under the rug, gives recipients the freedom to simply indefinitely delay proceedings against the interests of fairness and justice, or increases the risk of litigation against recipients. The Department believes that § 106.45(b)(1)(v) strikes an appropriate balance between imposing clear constraints on recipients in the interests of achieving Title IX's purpose, and ensuring they have adequate flexibility and discretion to select reasonably prompt time frames in a manner that each recipient can apply within its own unique educational environment. We also believe that moving away from a strict timeline that does not permit short-term extensions will help to address pitfalls and implementation problems that commenters have recounted in recipients' Title IX proceedings under the previous guidance, where some recipients felt pressure to resolve their grievance processes within 60 days regardless of the circumstances of the situation. The Department believes that recipients are in the best position to balance the interests of promptness, and fairness and accuracy, within the confines of such a decision resulting in ''reasonably prompt'' conclusion of grievance processes. This provision does not permit a recipient to conduct a grievance process without a ''set'' time frame; to the contrary, this provision requires a recipient to designate and include in its grievance process what its set time frame will be, for each phase of the grievance process (including appeals and any informal resolution process). Permitting recipients to set their own reasonably prompt time frames increases the likelihood that recipients will meet the time frames they have designated and thereby more often meet the expectations of students and employees as to how long a recipient's grievance process will take. Requiring recipients to notify the parties whenever the recipient applies a short-term delay or extension will further promote predictability and transparency of recipients' grievance process. Prescribing that any delay or extension must be for good cause, and must be temporary and limited in duration, ensures that no grievance process is open-ended and that parties receive a reasonably prompt resolution of each formal complaint.

Changes: None.

Concerns Regarding Concurrent Law Enforcement Activity

Comments: Some commenters opposed to this provision emphasized concerns about permitting delay for concurrent ongoing criminal investigations. Commenters asserted that criminal investigations can and often do take months or years because of rape kit backlogs or lengthy DNA analyses, and expressed concern about allowing schools to delay action for unspecified and lengthy periods. These commenters felt this would force students to wait months or longer for resolution as they suffer serious emotional and academic harm when they need timely responses and support to continue in school and to heal from their trauma. Some commenters felt that it would deny due process in school Title IX proceedings, ignore schools' independent Title IX obligations to remedy sex-based harassment, and allow perpetrators to evade responsibility or consequences or to perpetrate again. A number of commenters were concerned that schools delaying or suspending investigations at the request of law enforcement or prosecutors creates a safety risk to the survivor and to other students, by allowing assailants to harass or assault survivors or others during the waiting period. Commenters also asserted that Title IX and criminal justice proceedings have different purposes, considerations, rules of evidence, burdens of proof, and outcomes, and felt as a result that their determinations are separate and independent from each other. Some of these commenters also argued that schools should prioritize and not delay a complainant's educational access and can provide supportive measures that are not available from the police.

A number of commenters emphasized concerns about problematic incentives and consequences that they believed would result from permitting delays for concurrent ongoing criminal investigations. For example, some commenters felt that such a provision would incentivize survivors not to report to law enforcement, since it would delay resolution of their Title IX case, thereby increasing safety risks to both survivors and school communities. Other commenters believed this provision would force survivors who pursue a police investigation to wait a long time for it to end before receiving accommodations from their school or to drop their criminal case to get measures only schools can provide. At least one commenter expressed concern that students would be forced to bring civil cases to protect themselves during a criminal investigation. Many others asserted that it would force elementary and secondary school students to wait months or even longer for any resolution to their complaints as most school employees are legally required to report child sexual abuse to the police as mandatory reporters. A number of these commenters expressed concern that this might impede elementary and secondary schools from implementing critical safety measures for child victims until a criminal investigation is completed.

Discussion: We acknowledge the concerns raised by some commenters specifically relating to recipients' flexibility under § 106.45(b)(1)(v) to temporarily delay the grievance process due to concurrent law enforcement activity. The Department acknowledges that the criminal justice system and the Title IX grievance process serve distinct purposes. However, the two systems sometimes overlap with respect to allegations of conduct that constitutes sex discrimination under Title IX and criminal offenses under State or other laws. By acknowledging that concurrent law enforcement activity may constitute good cause for short-term delays or extensions of a recipient's designated time frames, this provision helps recipients navigate situations where a recipient is expected to meet its Title IX obligations while intersecting with criminal investigations that involve the same facts and parties. For example, if a concurrent law enforcement investigation uncovers evidence that the police plan to release on a specific time frame and that evidence would likely be material to the recipient's determination regarding responsibility, then the recipient may have good cause for a temporary delay or limited extension of its grievance process in order to allow that evidence to be included as part of the Title IX investigation. Because the final regulations only permit ''temporary'' delays or ''limited'' extensions of time frames even for good cause such as concurrent law enforcement activity, this provision does not result in protracted or open-ended investigations in situations where law enforcement's evidence collection (e.g., processing rape kits) occurs over a time period that extends more than briefly beyond the recipient's designated time frames.[1103]

In response to commenters concerned that concurrent law enforcement activity is prevalent especially in sexual misconduct situations in elementary and secondary schools (where mandatory child abuse reporting laws often require reporting sexual misconduct to law enforcement), § 106.45(b)(1)(v) benefits recipients and young victims in such situations by allowing circumstance-driven flexibility for schools and law enforcement to coordinate efforts so that sexual abuse against children is effectively addressed both in terms of the purposes of the criminal justice system and Title IX's non-discrimination mandate. While a grievance process is pending, recipients may (and must, if refusing to do so is clearly unreasonable under the circumstances) implement supportive measures designed to ensure a complainant's equal access to education, protect the safety of parties, and deter sexual harassment.

Changes: None.

Consistency With Other Federal Law

Comments: Some commenters raised concerns that allowing temporary delays or limited extensions conflicts with Title IX and Clery Act requirements that schools provide ''prompt'' resolution of complaints. Similarly, some commenters felt that permitting extensions for language assistance or disability accommodations is inconsistent with statutory obligations to provide these in a timely manner under Title VI, the Equal Educational Opportunities Act of 1974 (''EEOA''), ADA, and Section 504. Commenters also expressed concerns that the final regulations would permit delays for far longer than is permitted of employers under Title VII.

Discussion: Section 106.45(b)(1)(v) requires recipients to have good cause for any short-term delays or extensions, with written notice to the parties and an explanation for the delay or extension. Because the overall time frame must be reasonably prompt, and any delay or extension must be temporary or limited, § 106.45(b)(1)(v) poses no conflict with the Clery Act or other laws that require ''prompt'' resolution of processes designed to redress sexual harassment or sex offenses.[1104] Neither does application of short-term delays or extensions violate the ''promptness'' requirement that Title IX regulations have required since 1975; under the final regulations the grievance process still must be concluded in a ''reasonably prompt'' time frame and any delay or extension, even for good cause, may only be brief in length.

Recipients must still satisfy their legal obligation to provide timely auxiliary [1103] E.g., Williams v. Bd. of Regents of Univ. Sys. of Ga., 477 F.3d 1282· 1297 (11th Cir. 2007) (''[T]he pending criminal charges did not affect [the university's] ability to institute its own procedures'' and did not justify university waiting 11 months for outcome of the criminal matter before finishing its own investigation and conducting its own disciplinary proceeding against sexual misconduct respondents).

[1104] For further discussion see the ''Clery Act'' subsection of the ''Miscellaneous'' section of this preamble.

aids and services and reasonable accommodations under the ADA, Section 504, and Title VI, and should reasonably consider other services such as meaningful access to language assistance. With respect to the EEOA, Title VII, or other laws that may impose time frames on the same grievance process that recipients must apply under § 106.45, these final regulations permit a recipient to apply short-term delays or extensions for good cause. These final regulations do not require a recipient to apply short-term delays or extensions, and thus if a recipient is precluded by another law from extending a time frame the recipient is not required to do so under these final regulations.

Changes: None.

Alternative Proposals

Comments: A number of commenters suggested alternative approaches to address their concerns about the proposed time frames. Commenters also suggested other approaches such as: Eliminating any time frame requirement for recipients; barring delays due to an ongoing criminal investigation; prohibiting extensions for refusal to cooperate, lack of witnesses, or the need for language assistance or accommodation of disabilities; setting a time limit for law enforcement delays that is brief, such as three to ten days; setting a time limit for temporary delays and allowing delays for concurrent law enforcement activity only if requested by external municipal entities to gather evidence and for not more than ten days except when specifically requested and justified; and narrowing delay for law enforcement activity to only when absolutely necessary like when a school cannot proceed without evidence in law enforcement's exclusive domain (for example, a DNA sample to identify an unknown assailant). Other suggestions raised by commenters included: Requiring supportive measures while criminal and school investigations are ongoing; and ensuring schools and criminal justice agencies set protocols for concurrent investigations that are responsive to the complexity of these situations and to each entity's duties and timelines.

Discussion: The Department believes that recipients are in the best position to designate ''reasonably prompt time frames'' that balance the need to conclude Title IX grievance processes promptly with providing the fairness and accuracy that these final regulations require. For reasons discussed above, prompt resolution is important to serve the purpose of Title IX's non-discrimination mandate, and the Department thus declines to remove the requirement that recipients conclude grievance processes promptly. For reasons discussed above, the Department believes that categorically prohibiting delays based on concurrent law enforcement investigations would deprive recipients of flexibility to work effectively and appropriately with law enforcement where the purpose of both the criminal justice system and the Title IX grievance process is to protect victims of sexual misconduct, and this discretion is appropriately balanced by not permitting a recipient to apply a delay or extension (even for good cause) that is not ''temporary'' or ''limited.'' For similar reasons, the Department declines to specify a particular number of days that constitute ''temporary'' delays or ''limited'' extensions of time frames. State laws that do specify such maximum delays may be complied with by recipients without violating these final regulations, because § 106.45(b)(1)(v) allows but does not require a recipient to implement short-term delays even for good cause. The Department also reiterates that nothing in the final regulations precludes recipients from offering supportive measures to one or both parties while the grievance process is temporarily delayed, and revised § 106.44(a) obligates a recipient to offer supportive measures to complainants, with or without a grievance process pending.

The Department declines to allow short-term delays on the basis of working with a concurrent law enforcement effort only where the law enforcement agency specifically requests that the recipient delay, or only where the school and law enforcement agency have a memorandum of understanding or similar cooperative agreement in place. Recipients' obligations under Title IX are independent of recipients' obligations to cooperate or coordinate with law enforcement with respect to investigations or proceedings affecting the recipient's students or employees. These final regulations do not attempt to govern the circumstances where such cooperation or coordination may be required under other laws, or advisable as a best practice, but § 106.45(b)(1)(v) gives recipients flexibility to address situations that overlap with law enforcement activities so that potential victims of sex offenses are better served by both systems while ensuring that a recipient's grievance process is not made dependent on a concurrent law enforcement investigation, and thus a Title IX grievance process will still be concluded promptly even if the law enforcement matter is still ongoing.

Changes: None.

Clarification Requests

Comments: Commenters requested clarifications of certain terms used in this provision, including the terms reasonably prompt, absence of the parties or witnesses, administrative delay, limited extensions, and temporary delay. Commenters also requested clarification as to what does or does not constitute good cause for delay, such as with respect to administrative needs or accommodation of disabilities, as well as when and for how long schools should delay for law enforcement activity. Some commenters asked for more clarity about the limits on extensions, the mechanisms to end delays when the advantages are outweighed by the benefits of resolution, the steps schools must take to protect students regardless of law enforcement activity, and what OCR will assess in determining if a grievance process is prompt. Other commenters asked for a clarification that the list of examples of good cause for delay are not exhaustive, and several commenters requested clarifying that schools can excuse complainants from participating in the process for study abroad or other academic programming involving a significant time away from campus.

Discussion: As clarified above, the Department believes that recipients should retain flexibility to designate time frames that are reasonably prompt, and what is ''reasonable'' is a decision made in the context of a recipient's purpose of providing education programs or activities free from sex discrimination, thus requiring recipients to designate time frames taking into account the importance to students of resolving grievance processes so that students may focus their attention on participating in education programs or activities, and the reality that every academic term (e.g., an academic quarter, semester, trimester, etc.) is important to a student's progress toward advancing a grade level or completing a degree. A recipient must balance the foregoing realities with the need for recipients to conduct grievance processes fairly in a manner that reaches reliable outcomes, meeting the requirements of § 106.45, in deciding what time frames to include as ''reasonably prompt'' in a recipient's grievance process for formal complaints of sexual harassment under Title IX.

This provision's reference to the absence of parties or witnesses has its ordinary meaning, suggesting that the reasons for a party or witness's absence is a factor in a recipient deciding whether circumstances constitute ''good cause'' for a short-term delay or extension. With respect to administrative delay, we intend that concept to include delays caused by recipient inefficiencies or mismanagement of their own resources, but not necessarily circumstances outside the recipient's control (e.g., if technology relied on to conduct a live hearing is interrupted due to a power outage). We intend delay to have its ordinary meaning; a delay is a postponement of a deadline that would otherwise have applied. We appreciate the opportunity to clarify here that the examples of good cause listed in § 106.45(b)(1)(v) of the final regulations are illustrative, not exhaustive. We defer to recipients' experience and familiarity with the cases recipients investigate to determine whether other factual circumstances present good cause that could justify extending the time frame. Further, we wish to emphasize that any delay or extension contemplated by § 106.45(b)(1)(v) must be on a limited and temporary basis, regardless of the good cause that exists. The Department trusts recipients to make sound determinations regarding the length of a brief delay; we believe recipients are in the best position to make these decisions as they may be closer to the parties and have a deeper understanding of how to balance the interests of promptness, fairness to the parties, and accuracy of adjudications in each case. As noted above, a recipient's response to sexual harassment must include offering supportive measures to a complainant (with or without a grievance process pending). While a recipient is not obligated in every situation to offer supportive measures to a respondent, if refusing to offer supportive measures to a respondent (for instance, where a live hearing date that falls on a respondent's final examination date results in a respondent needing to reschedule the examination) would be clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances such a refusal could also violate these final regulations.

Changes: None.

Section 106.45(b)(1)(vi) Describe Range or List of Possible Sanctions and Remedies

Comments: Several commenters support this provision because it furthers due process. One commenter supported § 106.45(b)(1)(vi) because it will increase parties' understanding of the proceedings and decrease the possibility of arbitrary, disproportionate, or inconsistent sanctions. A group of concerned attorneys and educators commented that consistent standards, such as this provision, are necessary to ensure a fair process will benefit everyone. Another commenter expressed support for § 106.45(b)(1)(vi) because it promotes parity between parties; requiring recipients' grievance procedures to contain significant specificity is key because individuals must have a clear understanding of the procedures and possible penalties for wrongdoing. One commenter agreed that full and proper notice to all students, faculty, and other personnel is critical to the effective implementation of Title IX and therefore consistent with due process, so a recipient's grievance procedures must describe the range of possible sanctions and remedies that the recipient may implement following any determination of responsibility.

Discussion: The Department agrees with commenters that it is important to provide to all students, faculty, and other personnel a clear understanding of the possible remedies and sanctions under a recipient's Title IX grievance process. The Department agrees with commenters who asserted that § 106.45(b)(1)(vi) furthers due process protections for both parties and lessens the likelihood of ineffective remedies and arbitrary, disproportionate, or inconsistent disciplinary sanctions. For consistency of terminology, the final regulations use ''disciplinary sanctions'' rather than ''sanctions'' including in this provision, to avoid ambiguity as to whether a ''sanction'' differed from a ''disciplinary sanction.'' Throughout the NPRM and these final regulations, where reference is made to disciplinary sanctions, the provisions are calling attention to the disciplinary nature of the action taken by the recipient, and the phrase ''disciplinary sanctions'' is thus more specific and accurate than the word ''sanctions.'' Because the intent of this provision is to provide clarity for recipients and their educational communities, we have also revised this provision to state that the recipient's grievance process must describe ''or list'' the range of disciplinary sanctions, to clarify that complying with this provision also complies with the Clery Act.[1105]

Changes: We have revised the final regulations to use the phrase ''disciplinary sanctions'' consistently, replacing ''sanctions'' with ''disciplinary sanctions'' in provisions such as § 106.45(b)(1)(vi). We have also revised § 106.45(b)(1)(vi) to state that a recipient may describe the range of possible sanctions and remedies or list the possible disciplinary sanctions and remedies that the recipient may implement following any determination of responsibility.

Comments: A number of commenters opposed § 106.45(b)(1)(vi). One commenter expressed concern that this provision is too restrictive because disciplinary actions are often implemented in a number of creative ways that are specific to each individual case. One commenter expressed concern that the proposed regulations, including this provision, are unconstitutional, since the decisions to be made by the ''decision-maker'' determining responsibility and sanctions against a student are those that must be made by the judicial branch of government acting under Article III of the U.S. Constitution, and not by the executive branch, or by the recipient.

Several commenters expressed concern that recipients should not be required to describe a range of sanctions. One commenter expressed concern that each type of employee at their university has their own grievance procedures and penalties and appeals process, and the university does not have the expertise to know in certain circumstances how a faculty member's tenure would be implicated. One university commented that notice of investigation letters may exacerbate tense situations because the practice will be to describe every possible sanction, including termination, even when the possibility of some sanctions is remote or would contravene good practice.

Several commenters proposed modifications to § 106.45(b)(1)(vi). One commenter urged the Department to offer examples of the types of remedies it would find equitable, and the types of sanctions it would find acceptable, asserting that at a minimum, the Department should make clear that it defers to the educational judgment of schools to take into consideration the myriad factors impacting the elementary and secondary school environment, from age to developmental level and beyond, in implementing the ''equitability'' requirement. One commenter suggested the language be altered due to the importance of ensuring that any sanction imposed be proportional to the offense committed, and noted that this principle reflects our societal understanding of punishment, as reflected in the U.S. Constitution's prohibition on ''cruel and unusual punishment.'' The commenter argued that the proposed language would allow minor violations of university policy to be punished in extreme, disproportionate ways and would also allow for different violations to be punished in the same manner as long as the punishment had been described in the grievance process. One commenter suggested that this provision should be altered to clarify that collective punishment is unacceptable to the extent that it punishes individuals or organizations that did not perpetrate, or were not found responsible for perpetrating, the offense in question.

One commenter suggested that recipients should be required to list any factors that will or will not be considered in issuing a sanction. One commenter suggested the Department should make clear how specific the range of sanctions must be and that recipients be permitted to state, for example, ''suspension of varying lengths'' rather than having to itemize every possible length of a suspension.

Discussion: The Department proposed § 106.45(b)(1)(vi) to provide consistency, predictability, and transparency as to the range of consequences (both in terms of remedies for complainants, and disciplinary sanctions for respondents) students can expect from the outcome of a grievance process. A transparent grievance process benefits all parties because they are more likely to trust in, engage with, and rely upon the process as legitimate. After a respondent has been found responsible for sexual harassment, any disciplinary sanction decision rests within the discretion of the recipient, and the recipient must provide remedies to the complainant designed to restore or preserve the complainant's educational access, as provided for in § 106.45(b)(1)(i). Both parties should be advised of the potential range of remedies and disciplinary sanctions.

The Department disagrees that the decision-maker imposing disciplinary sanctions must be a judge appointed under Article III of the Constitution. As discussed in the ''Adoption and Adaption of the Supreme Court's Framework to Address Sexual Harassment'' section of this preamble, Title IX is a Federal civil rights law, and the Supreme Court has judicially implied a private right of action under Title IX, and in private litigation in Federal courts a Federal judge may impose remedies to effectuate the purposes of Title IX. However, the Title IX statute expressly authorizes Federal agencies, such as the Department, to administratively enforce Title IX and require recipients to take remedial action following violations of Title IX or regulations implementing Title IX. Such administrative enforcement of Title IX does not require the participation or direction of an Article III Federal judge. In these final regulations, the Department has determined that the Department's interest in effectuating Title IX's non-discrimination mandate necessitates setting forth a predictable, fair grievance process for resolving allegations of Title IX sexual harassment and requiring recipients to provide remedies to complainants if a respondent is found responsible. The Department has determined that administrative enforcement of Title IX does not require overriding recipients' discretion to make decisions regarding disciplinary sanctions, and thus these final regulations focus on ensuring that respondents are not punished or disciplined unless a fair process has determined responsibility, but respects the discretion of State and local educators to make disciplinary decisions pursuant to a recipient's own code of conduct.

The Department acknowledges commenters' concerns that each type of employee at their university has their own grievance procedures, penalties, and appeals process as well as concerns about whether tenure may be implicated, but disagrees that this presents a problem under § 106.45(b)(1)(vi). The Department believes that simply providing a range of sanctions to respondents is feasible despite the reality of the different grievance procedures and penalties and appeals that may apply depending on whether a recipient's employee is tenured, and the final regulations permit the recipient to either list the possible disciplinary sanctions or describe the range of possible disciplinary sanctions. Describing a range of disciplinary sanctions should not be difficult for recipients, particularly regarding a maximum sanction.

Nothing in the final regulations prevents the recipient from communicating that the described range is required by Federal law under Title IX and that the published range is purely for purposes of notice as to the possibility of a range of remedies and disciplinary sanctions and does not reflect the probability that any particular outcome will occur.

The Department does not believe offering examples of types of appropriate disciplinary sanctions is necessary because as discussed above, whether and what type of sanctions are imposed is a decision left to the sound discretion of recipients. Similarly, these final regulations do not impose a standard of proportionality on disciplinary sanctions. Some commenters raised concerns that disciplinary sanctions against respondents found responsible are too severe, not severe enough, or that student discipline should be an educational process rather than a punitive process. These final regulations permit recipients to evaluate such considerations and make disciplinary decisions that each recipient believes are in the best interest of the recipient's educational environment. Because the recipient's grievance process must describe the range, or list the possible, disciplinary sanctions and remedies, a recipient's students and employees will understand whether the recipient has, for example, decided that certain disciplinary sanctions or certain remedies are not available following a grievance process. This clarity gives potential complainants a sense of what a recipient intends provide in terms of remedies and potential respondents a sense of what a recipient is prepared to impose in terms of disciplinary sanctions, with respect to victimization and perpetration of Title IX sexual harassment.

Because remedies are required under the final regulations, the Department agrees with commenters who suggested more clarity as to what constitute possible remedies. The final regulations revise another provision, § 106.45(b)(1)(i), to specify that remedies designed to restore or preserve equal access to the recipient's education program or activity may include the same individualized services described in § 106.30 ''supportive measures,'' but that remedies need not be non-disciplinary or non-punitive and need not avoid burdening the respondent. The Department believes this level of specificity is sufficient to emphasize that remedies aim to ensure a complainant's equal educational access. As discussed in the ''Adoption and Adaption of the Supreme Court's Framework to Address Sexual Harassment'' section of this preamble, a recipient's choice of remedies will be evaluated under the deliberate indifference standard.

With respect to a recipient punishing an organization or group of individuals following a member of the organization or group being found responsible for sexual harassment, these final regulations require a recipient to respond to sexual harassment incidents in specific ways, including by investigating and adjudicating allegations of sexual harassment made in a formal complaint. The final regulations only contemplate adjudication of allegations against a respondent (defined in § 106.30 as an ''individual,'' not a group or organization). In order for a respondent to face disciplinary sanctions under the final regulations, the respondent must be brought into the grievance process through a formal complaint alleging conduct that could constitute sexual harassment defined in § 106.30.[1106] The final regulations do not address sanctions by a recipient imposed against groups for non-sexual harassment offenses.

By describing the range, or listing the possible disciplinary sanctions, a recipient is notifying its community of the possible consequences of a determination that a respondent is responsible for Title IX sexual harassment; this provision is thus intended to increase the transparency and predictability of the grievance process, but it is not intended to unnecessarily restrict a recipient's ability to tailor disciplinary sanctions to address specific situations. We therefore decline to state that the range or list provided by the recipient under this provision is exclusive. For similar reasons, we decline to require a recipient to state what factors might be considered with respect to decisions regarding disciplinary sanctions or to impose more detailed requirements in this provision than the requirement to describe a range, or list the possible disciplinary sanctions. As described above, in response to commenters' desire for more specificity in this provision, the final regulations revise this provision to permit a recipient to either ''describe the range'' or ''list the possible'' disciplinary sanctions and remedies; this change gives recipients the option to comply with this provision in a more specific manner (i.e., by listing possible disciplinary sanctions and remedies rather than by describing a range).

Changes: The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(1)(vi) to give recipients the option to either ''describe the range of'' or ''list the possible'' disciplinary sanctions and remedies.

Section 106.45(b)(1)(vii) Describe Standard of Evidence

Comments: A number of commenters expressed support for § 106.45(b)(1)(vii). One commenter stated that fully informing the parties of the standard of evidence as part of the recipients' policies is very important in Title IX procedures, since the respondent and the complainant must understand how such proceedings will unfold. Other commenters expressed support because a consistent standard of evidence is necessary to ensure a fair process. One commenter expressed support because this is a common-sense provision. One commenter supported § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) because it will increase parties' understanding of the proceedings and decrease the possibility of arbitrary, disproportionate, or inconsistent decisions.

Discussion: The Department agrees that fully informing the parties of the standard of evidence that a recipient has determined most appropriate for reaching conclusions about Title IX sexual harassment, by describing that standard of evidence in the recipient's grievance process, is an important element of a fair process. The Department agrees that a standard of evidence selected by each recipient and applied consistently to formal complaints of sexual harassment is necessary to ensure a fair process.[1107]

In response to commenters who noted, under comments directed to § 106.45(b)(7), that the NPRM lacked clarity as to whether a recipient's choice between the preponderance of the evidence standard and the clear and convincing evidence standard was a choice that a recipient could make in each individual case, the Department revised language in § 106.45(b)(7) and correspondingly revised language in § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) to read: ''State whether the standard of evidence to be used to determine responsibility is the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard, apply the same standard of evidence for formal complaints against students as for formal complaints against employees, including faculty, and apply the same standard of evidence to all formal complaints of sexual harassment[.]'' These revisions clarify that the standard of evidence must be selected, stated, and applied consistently by each recipient to all formal complaints of sexual harassment.

Changes: The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) to clearly require a recipient's grievance process to state up front which of the two permissible standards of evidence the recipient has selected and then to apply that selected standard to all formal complaints of sexual harassment, including those against employees.

Section 106.45(b)(1)(viii) Procedures and Bases for Appeal

Comments: Some commenters expressed general support for § 106.45(b)(1)(viii), arguing that requiring recipients to specify appeal procedures will promote a fair process that will benefit everyone and ensure parity between the parties. Two commenters recommended that the Department add specific language regarding when a decision may be appealed. One commenter suggested that the Department clarify that the parties are allowed to raise a procedural problem at the hearing without waiting to file an appeal over the procedural breach. Another commenter suggested that the Department add language describing the specific instances in which a complainant or respondent is permitted to appeal. The commenter stated that in instances where the recipient determines the respondent to be responsible for the alleged conduct and implements a remedy designed to restore a complainant's equal access to the recipient's education program or activity, the complainant may appeal the remedy as inadequate to restore the complainant's equal access to the recipient's education program or activity to prevent its reoccurrence, and address its adverse effects on the complainant and others who may have been adversely affected by the sexual harassment. The commenter further stated that in instances where the recipient determines the respondent to be responsible for the alleged conduct, the respondent can appeal the recipient's determination of responsibility. The commenter explained that these should be the only two situations in which an appeal is permitted because allowing a complainant to appeal a recipient's determination of non-responsibility subjects the respondent to administrative double jeopardy and contravenes the principles of basic fairness. The commenter asserted that this is especially troublesome for students from low-income families with little or no access to free legal counsel.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the general support received from commenters for § 106.45(b)(1)(viii), which requires recipients' Title IX [1106] Emergency removal under § 106.44(c) is an exception that allows punitive action (i.e., removal from education programs or activities) against a respondent without going through a grievance process.

[1107] E.g., Lavinia M. Weizel, The Process That Is Due: Preponderance of The Evidence as The Standard of Proof For University Adjudications of Student-On-Student Sexual Assault Complaints, 53 Boston College L. Rev. 1613, 1631 (2012) (explaining that selecting a standard of evidence (also called a standard of proof) ''is important for theoretical and practical reasons'' including that the ''standard of proof imposed in a particular class of cases reflects the value society places on the rights that are in jeopardy'' because ''standards of proof signal to the fact-finder the level of certainty society requires before the state may act to impair an individual's rights'' and whichever standard is selected, ''articulating a specific standard of proof for a particular type of hearing . . . helps to ensure the meaningfulness of the hearing's other procedural safeguards'') (internal citations omitted).

grievance process to include the permissible bases and procedures for complainants and respondents to appeal. The Department is persuaded by commenters that we should clarify the circumstances in which the parties may appeal, and that both parties should have equal appeal rights, and § 106.45(b)(8) of the final regulations require recipients to offer appeals, equally to both parties, on at least the three following bases: (1) Procedural irregularity that affected the outcome; (2) new evidence that was not reasonably available when the determination of responsibility was made that could affect the outcome; or (3) the Title IX Coordinator, investigator, or decision-maker had a conflict of interest or bias that affected the outcome. Nothing in the final regulations precludes a party from raising the existence of procedural defects that occurred during the grievance process during a live hearing, and the final regulations ensure that whether or not a party has observed or objected to a procedural defect during the hearing, the party may still appeal on the basis of procedural irregularity after the determination regarding responsibility has been made. The Department believes that a complainant entitled to remedies should not need to file an appeal to challenge the recipient's selection of remedies; instead, we have revised § 106.45(b)(7)(iv) to require that Title IX Coordinator is responsible for effective implementation of remedies. This permits a complainant to work with the Title IX Coordinator to select and effectively implement remedies designed to restore or preserve the complainant's equal access to education.

Complainants and respondents have different interests in the outcome of a sexual harassment complaint. Complainants ''have a right, and are entitled to expect, that they may attend [school] without fear of sexual assault or harassment'' and to expect recipients to respond promptly to complaints.[1108] For respondents, a ''finding of responsibility for a sexual offense can have a 'lasting impact' on a student's personal life, in addition to [the student's] 'educational and employment opportunities'[.]'' [1109] Although these interests may differ, each represents high-stakes, potentially life-altering consequences deserving of an accurate outcome.[1110]

We disagree with the commenters who argued that the final regulations should prohibit appeals of not responsible determinations because of double jeopardy concerns. The Department emphasizes that the constitutional prohibition on double jeopardy does not apply to Title IX proceedings and the Department does not believe that such a prohibition is needed to ensure fair and accurate resolution of sexual harassment allegations under Title IX. Where a procedural error, newly discovered evidence, or conflict of interest or bias has affected the outcome resulting in an inaccurate determination of non-responsibility, the recipient's obligation to redress sexual harassment in its education program or activity may be hindered, but the recipient may correct that inaccurate outcome on appeal and thus accurately identify the nature of sexual harassment in its education program or activity and provide remedies to the victim. Further, and as discussed above, we believe that both respondents and complainants face potentially life-altering consequences from the outcomes of Title IX proceedings. Both parties have a strong interest in accurate determinations regarding responsibility and it is important to protect complainants' right to appeal as well as respondents' right to appeal. We note that the final regulations do not require a party to hire an attorney for any phase of the grievance process, including on appeal.

Changes: We have revised § 106.45(b)(1)(viii) to remove the ''if the recipient offers an appeal'' language because § 106.45(b)(8) of the final regulations make appeals for both parties mandatory, on three bases: Procedural irregularity, newly discovered evidence, and bias or conflict of interest on the part of the Title IX Coordinator, investigator, or decision-maker.

Section 106.45(b)(1)(ix) Describe Range of Supportive Measures

Comments: Several commenters supported § 106.45(b)(1)(ix) requiring recipients to describe the range of supportive measures available to complainants and respondents. Some commenters asserted that this requirement would promote parity between the parties and ensure a fair process that will benefit everyone. One commenter recommended that the Department encourage recipients to retain and maintain the names and contact information for individual groups, and other entities that provide support in these circumstances, including counselors, psychiatrists, law firms, and educational advocates, and make the information available to all parties. Two commenters suggested that the Department add language to the final regulations clarifying that complainants and respondents must be afforded the same level of advocacy and supportive care so that both parties are treated equally. Another commenter was concerned that the requirement would be difficult to meet because supportive measures are often determined on an ad hoc basis and vary from investigation to investigation. To address this concern, the commenter recommended that the Department instead require grievance procedures to address the availability of supportive measures and describe some common examples.

Discussion: The Department agrees that requiring recipients to describe the range of supportive measures available to complainants and respondents is an important part of ensuring that the grievance process is transparent to all members of a recipient's educational community. Section 106.45(b)(1)(ix), particularly, notifies both parties of the kind of individualized services that may be available while a party navigates a grievance process, which many commenters asserted is a stressful and difficult process for complainants and respondents.

The Department clarifies that this provision does not require equality or parity in terms of the supportive measures actually available to, or offered to, complainants and respondents generally, or to a complainant or respondent in a particular case. This provision must be understood in conjunction with the obligation of a recipient to offer supportive measures to complainants (including having the Title IX Coordinator engage in an interactive discussion with the complainant to determine appropriate supportive measures), while no such obligation exists with respect to respondents. By defining supportive measures to mean individualized services that cannot unreasonably burden either party, these final regulations incentivize recipients to make supportive measures available to respondents, but these final regulations require recipients to offer supportive measures to complainants. In revised § 106.44(a), and in § 106.45(b)(1)(i) these final regulations reinforce that equitable treatment of complainants and respondents means providing supportive measures and remedies for complainants, and avoiding disciplinary action against respondents unless the recipient follows the § 106.45 grievance process. The Department does not intend, and the final regulations do not require, to impose a requirement of equality or parity with respect to supportive measures provided to complainants and respondents.

The Department declines to require recipients to disseminate to students the names and contact information for organizations that provide support in these circumstances, including counselors, psychiatrists, law firms, educational advocates, and so forth, or make such a list available to all parties, although nothing in these final regulations precludes a recipient from doing so. The specific resources available in the general community surrounding the recipient's campus may change frequently making it difficult for recipients to accurately list currently available resources. The Department believes that by requiring recipients to describe the range of supportive measures made available by a recipient as part of the recipient's grievance process, and defining ''supportive measures'' in § 106.30 (which also includes an illustrative list of possible supportive measures), parties will be adequately advised of the types of individualized services available as they navigate a grievance process. A recipient may choose to create and distribute lists of specific resources in addition to complying with § 106.45(b)(1)(ix).

The Department appreciates the commenter's concern that the requirement would be difficult to meet because supportive measures are often determined on an ad hoc basis and vary from investigation to investigation. However, it is for this reason that the Department is only requiring a recipient's grievance process to describe the range of supportive measures available rather than a list of supportive measures available. One commenter requested that the Department provide examples of supportive measures. A non-exhaustive list of types of supportive measures is stated in the definition of ''supportive measures'' in § 106.30. Recipients retain the flexibility to employ age-appropriate methods, exercise common sense and good judgment, and take into account the needs of the parties involved when determining the type of supportive measures appropriate for a particular party in a particular situation, and this flexibility is not inhibited by the requirement to describe the range of available supportive measures in § 106.45(b)(1)(ix).

Section 106.45(b)(1)(x) Privileged Information

Comments: As discussed in more detail in the ''Hearings'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble, commenters inquired whether the § 106.45 grievance process required cross-examination questions that call for disclosure of attorney-client privileged information to be allowed to be asked during a live hearing held by a postsecondary institution.

Discussion: To ensure that a recipient's grievance process respects information protected by a legally recognized privilege (for example, attorney-client privilege, doctor-patient privilege, spousal privilege, and so forth), the Department has added a provision addressing protection of all privileged information during a grievance process.

Changes: We have added new § 106.45(b)(1)(x) to ensure that information protected by a legally recognized privilege is not used during a grievance process.

Written Notice of Allegations

Section 106.45(b)(2) Written Notice of Allegations

Retaliation

Comments: Many commenters opposed § 106.45(b)(2), arguing that respondents may retaliate against complainants if respondents are given notice of a formal complaint that contains the complainant's identity. Some commenters cited a study which found that the fear of retaliation by the accused or by peers is a barrier for people to report sexual assault.[1111] These commenters also expressed concern that § 106.45(b)(2) does not require the recipient to assure the complainant that, if retaliation occurs, the recipient would take steps to correct the retaliatory actions. Commenters argued that such a requirement would affirm to complainants that they will be safeguarded by recipients in their complaints, and would help encourage complainants to come forward with reports of sexual harassment or assault. Several commenters argued that, because the Department provides for a warning to complainants against false allegations, the provision should also require recipients to warn respondents against retaliation. One commenter suggested that the provision should identify the types of retaliation prohibited, such as threats of civil litigation against the complainant for defamation, or spreading rumors intended to intimidate the complainant from filing a complaint. Another commenter asserted that the provision should notify the parties of the retaliation prohibition that is included in the Title IX regulation, at 34 CFR 106.71 that currently states that the Title VI regulation at 34 CFR 100.7(e) is incorporated by reference into the Title IX regulations. One commenter asked the Department to create an independent Title IX prohibition against retaliation to protect the complainant. Another commenter stated that the Clery Act requires that recipients' sexual misconduct policies include prohibitions of retaliation. A commenter cited Jackson v. Birmingham Board of Education, 544 U.S. 167 (2005) for the proposition that civil rights cannot be adequately protected if people can be punished for asserting such rights.

Commenters argued that some allegations of sexual assault involve circumstances so serious that providing respondents notice of a complaint would place the complainant at significant risk of further—and potentially escalating levels of—violence. Other commenters argued that respondents may destroy evidence or create false alibis if recipients give respondents detailed notice of the allegations in a formal complaint.

Other commenters expressed strong support for § 106.45(b)(2), arguing that society cannot purport to deliver justice for victims when extra-governmental institutions are permitted to ignore due process and the rule of law. Some commenters opined that only in the most totalitarian systems are people investigated and adjudicated without knowledge of the specific details of the charges before they are expected to present a defense. A number of commenters shared personal stories about respondents being interviewed multiple times by school officials before they were told what allegations had been made against them. Other commenters shared personal stories about recipients interviewing respondents without informing the respondent what precisely the complainant had alleged or when or where the alleged misconduct had occurred, and then when the respondent expressed uncertainty in recalling certain details in the interview, the recipient later cited the respondent's uncertain memory as evidence of the respondent's guilt. Commenters stated that, in these instances, respondents lost credibility when they were unable to clearly quote facts and events involving unclear allegations on a moment's notice at a surprise interview.

[1111] Commenters cited: Shelley Hymel & Susan M. Swearer: Four Decades of Research on School Bullying: An Introduction, 70 Am. Psychol. 293, 295 (May–June 2015) (youth ''are reluctant to report bullying, given legitimate fears of negative repercussions''); Ganga Vijayasiri, Reporting Sexual Harassment: The Importance of Organizational Culture and Trust, 25 Gender Issues 43, 53–54, 56 (2008) (''fear of adverse career consequences, or being blamed for the incident are a major deterrent to reporting'' and this includes peer mistreatment or disapproval).

Discussion: The Department is persuaded by commenters' unease over a perceived lack of protection against retaliation and therefore the final regulations add § 106.71, which prohibits any person from intimidating, threatening, coercing, or discriminating against any individual for the purpose of interfering with any right or privilege secured by Title IX including, among other things, making a report or formal complaint of sexual harassment. Recipients may communicate this protection against retaliation to the parties in any manner the recipient chooses. The Department disagrees that the warning about consequences for making false statements (if such a prohibition exists in the recipient's code of conduct) is directed only to complainants; such a warning is for the benefit of both parties so that if the recipient has chosen to make a prohibition against false statements part of the recipient's code of conduct, both parties are on notice that the § 106.45 grievance process potentially implicates that provision of the recipient's code of conduct. Similarly, § 106.71 protects all parties (and witnesses, and other individuals) from retaliation for exercising rights under Title IX, and is not directed solely toward complainants.

The Department understands that some complainants may fear to report sexual harassment or file a formal complaint alleging sexual harassment, because of the possibility of retaliation, and intends that adding § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation will empower complainants to report and file a formal complaint, if and when the complainant desires to do so. Recipients are obligated to offer supportive measures to a complainant (with or without the filing of a formal complaint) and to engage the complainant in an interactive discussion regarding the complainant's wishes with respect to supportive measures.[1112] Recipients must keep confidential the provision of supportive measures to the extent possible to allow implementation of the supportive measures.[1113] Thus, a complainant may discuss with the Title IX Coordinator the type of supportive measures that may be appropriate due to a complainant's concerns about retaliation by the respondent (or others), or fears of continuing or escalating violence by the respondent. A recipient's decision about which supportive measures are offered and implemented for a complainant is judged under the deliberate indifference standard, which by definition takes into account the unique, particular circumstances faced by a complainant. For reasons described below in this section of the preamble, the Department has determined that a grievance process cannot proceed, consistent with due process and fundamental fairness, without the respondent being apprised of the identity of the complainant (as well as other sufficient details of the alleged sexual harassment incident). Thus, a complainant's identity cannot be withheld from the respondent once a formal complaint initiates a grievance process, yet this does not obviate a recipient's ability and responsibility to implement supportive measures designed to protect a complainant's safety, deter sexual harassment, and restore or preserve a complainant's equal educational access.[1114]

The Department believes that providing written notice of the allegations to both parties equally benefits complainants; after a recipient receives a formal complaint, a complainant benefits from seeing and understanding how the recipient has framed the allegations so that the complainant can prepare to participate in the grievance process in ways that best advance the complainant's interests in the case. The Department disagrees that providing written notice of allegations increases the risk that a respondent will destroy evidence or concoct alibis, and even if such a risk existed the Department believes that benefit of providing detailed notice of the allegations outweighs such a risk because a party cannot be fairly expected to respond to allegations without the allegations being described prior to the expected response. Further, if a respondent does respond to a notice of allegations by destroying evidence or inventing an alibi, nothing in the final regulations prevents the recipient from taking such inappropriate conduct into account when reaching a determination regarding responsibility, numerous provisions in § 106.45 provide sufficient ways for the recipient (and complainant) to identify ways in which a respondent has fabricated (or invented, or concocted) untrue information, and such actions may also violate non-Title IX provisions of a recipient's code of conduct.

Changes: The final regulations add § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation by any person, against any person exercising rights under Title IX, and specify that complaints of retaliation may be filed with the recipient for handling under the ''prompt and equitable'' grievance procedures that recipients must adopt and publish for non-sexual harassment sex discrimination complaints by students and employees under § 106.8(c).

Warning Against False Statements

Comments: Several commenters asserted that the requirement in § 106.45(b)(2) that the written notice of allegations sent to both parties must contain information about any prohibition against knowingly submitting false information will chill reports of sexual assault because the provision implies that the Department does not believe allegations of sexual assault. One commenter shared the Department's interest in preserving the truth-seeking nature of the grievance process, but expressed concern that the threat implicit in the proposed admonition will outweigh its value. The commenter asserted that parties' and witnesses' statements rarely neatly align and inconsistencies can stem from passage of time, effects of drugs or alcohol, general unreliability of human perception and memory, and other factors. The commenter asserted that school officials are rarely so certain a party is lying that they should pursue discipline, yet the admonition in § 106.45(b)(2) suggests otherwise. The commenter warned that the resulting fear is likely to discourage participation in the process and inhibit the candor the Department stated it is seeking, and the commenter believed that parties may interpret the statement as their school's endorsement of harmful stereotypes about the prevalence of false sexual misconduct reports.

Many commenters asserted that most women who choose not to come forward do so because of the fear that people will not believe them. Commenters cited research showing that victims rarely make false allegations, and that only [1113] Section 106.30 (defining ''supportive measures'').

[1114] Id. (supportive measures must not be punitive or disciplinary). However, a recipient may warn a respondent that retaliation is prohibited and inform the respondent of the consequences of retaliating against the complainant, as part of a supportive measure provided for a complainant, because such a warning is not a punitive or disciplinary action against the respondent.

somewhere between two to ten percent of sexual assault allegations are false.[1115] Commenters asserted that men are more likely to be sexually assaulted themselves than to be falsely accused of committing sexual assault.[1116] Commenters argued that because false allegations are so rare, there is no benefit to including a warning against making false statements and the only purpose of such a warning is to deter complainants from reporting or filing formal complaints.

One commenter suggested that § 106.45(b)(2) should state that, if the recipient finds the respondent not responsible at the conclusion of the proceedings, a determination of not responsible will not, based on the finding alone, result in the complainant being deemed to have made false allegations. The commenter further requested that the written notice include a statement that the recipient presumes that the complainant is bringing a truthful complaint.

One commenter wanted clarification as to how false accusations would be determined. One commenter wished to know whether false accusations are a Title IX offense, and if so, who is authorized to bring a complaint alleging a false accusation. The commenter also wondered if a complainant can be held accountable for making a false report of sexual harassment if the recipient's code of conduct does not have a provision about submitting false statements during a disciplinary proceeding.

Several commenters who favored § 106.45(b)(2) suggested that the provision should subject students who knowingly made false allegations to disciplinary proceedings. Other commenters asked the Department to explain what minimum consequences will apply to students who make false allegations of sexual assault.

Discussion: The Department first notes that § 106.45(b)(2)(i)(B) will only apply to those situations in which the recipient's code of conduct prohibits students from knowingly making false statements or submitting false information during a disciplinary proceeding. If the recipient's code of conduct is silent on the issue of false statements in the grievance process, then the final regulations do not require recipients to include reference to false statements in the § 106.45(b)(2) written notice. If, on the other hand, a recipient's own code of conduct does reference making false statements during a school disciplinary proceeding then the Department believes that both parties deserve to know that their school, college, or university has such a provision that could subject either party to potential school discipline as a result of participation in the Title IX grievance process. Further, this ''warning'' about making false statements applies equally to respondents, as to complainants. Respondents should understand how a recipient intends to handle false statements (e.g., in the form of a respondent's denials of allegations) made during the grievance process.

Because the warning about making false statements occurs at a time when the complainants have already filed a formal complaint, the Department does not foresee that a complainant's decision to report sexual harassment (which need not also involve filing a formal complaint) will be affected by the recipient's notice about whether the recipient's code of conduct prohibits making false statements during a grievance process. The warning about false statements is not a requirement that the complainants' statements ''neatly align'' with the statements of other parties' or witnesses' statements, as one commenter suggested. Nor does the Department agree that the warning enforces harmful stereotypes about the prevalence of false sexual misconduct reports. The warning informs both parties about code of conduct provisions that govern either party's conduct at the grievance process, and only applies if such provisions exist in the recipients' own code of conduct. In response to commenters' concerns and to clarify for recipients, complainants, and respondents that merely making an allegation that a respondent or witness disagrees with (or is otherwise unintentionally inaccurate) constitutes a punishable ''false statement,'' the final regulations include § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation for exercising Title IX rights generally, and specifically stating that while it is not retaliatory when a recipient charges a party with a code of conduct violation for making a bad faith, materially false statement in a Title IX proceeding, such a conclusion cannot be based solely on the determination regarding responsibility. This emphasizes that the mere fact that the outcome was not favorable (which could turn on a decision-maker deciding that the party or a witness was not credible, or did not provide accurate information, or that there was insufficient evidence to meet the recipient's burden of proof) is not sufficient to conclude that the party who ''lost'' the case made a bad faith, materially false statement warranting punishment.

The Department is sympathetic to the difficulties complainants face in bringing a formal complaint. But recognition of the difficulties faced by complainants navigating the grievance process should not overshadow the fact that the respondent also faces significant consequences in the grievance process, nor lessen the need for both parties to be advised by the recipient of the allegations under investigation. The Department appreciates commenters' assertions regarding the relative infrequency of false allegations; however, § 106.45(b)(2) is intended to emphasize the importance of both parties being truthful during the grievance process by giving both parties information about how a particular recipient addresses false statements in the recipient's own code of conduct. Because the statement about false statements referred to in § 106.45(b)(2) is not a statement about the truthfulness of respondents, the Department declines to require any statement in this provision regarding the truthfulness of complainants. Similarly, the statement in the written notice provision regarding the presumption that a respondent is not responsible is not a statement about the credibility or truthfulness of respondents,[1117] and the Department declines to require any statement in the written notice regarding truthfulness of complainants. Regardless of the frequency or infrequency of false or unfounded allegations, every party involved in a formal complaint of sexual harassment deserves a fair process designed to resolve the truth of the particular allegations at issue, without reference to whether similar allegations are ''usually'' (based on statistics or generalizations) true or untrue.

Any determination that a complainant (or respondent) has violated the recipient's code of conduct with respect to making false statements during a grievance process is a fact-specific determination for the recipient to decide; however, as noted above, the final regulations add § 106.71 advising recipients that it could constitute retaliation to punish a party for false statements if that conclusion is reached solely based on the determination regarding responsibility, thus cautioning recipients to carefully assess whether a particular complainant (or respondent) should face code of conduct charges involving false statements.

The Department declines to follow the recommendations of commenters who argued that § 106.45(b)(2) should include a provision that subjects students who knowingly make false statements to disciplinary proceedings, nor does the Department wish to prescribe what the minimum consequences of making a false statement would be. If the recipient believes that a party violated the recipient's code of conduct during the grievance process, the recipient may investigate the matter under its own code of conduct, but the Department does not require such action.

Changes: The final regulations add § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation for exercising Title IX rights generally, and specifically stating that while it is not retaliatory when a recipient punishes a party for making a bad faith, materially false statement in a Title IX proceeding, such a conclusion cannot be based solely on the determination regarding responsibility.

Investigative Process

Comments: Several commenters with experience conducting criminal investigations asserted that, to get reliable and truthful information, it is important not to warn subjects of a criminal investigation that they are under investigation. The commenters argued that giving parties notice of the details of an alleged incident before the initial interview may give them the ability to affect the outcome of their case by manipulating their own testimony, tampering with evidence, or intimidating witnesses. Several commenters asked the Department to change the notice requirement to align with standard investigation practices that call for unplanned interviews. These commenters suggested that recipients not be required to give parties notice of allegations until the university has decided to proceed with formal charges. Another commenter stated that, although there is general agreement that providing sufficient notice prior to interviews effectuates the rights to an advisor guaranteed by VAWA Section 304, the industry standard is to provide this notice prior to charging, not prior to interviewing.

One commenter who designs policies to address sexual assault on a university campus pointed out that universities lack the power to subpoena witnesses in its investigations. Since the notice provision in § 106.45(b)(2) gives witnesses ample time to craft their testimony before an initial interview, and as the university already lacks the ability to compel witnesses to hand over evidence, the commenter argued that the notice provision will hamper a recipient's ability to gather accurate testimony. To repair this problem, the commenter suggested that the Department instead require recipients to give notice of allegations to interested parties after the university has completed all initial interviews and has decided to proceed with a formal grievance procedure.

One commenter wanted to know how the provision would affect university police investigative techniques. Specifically, the commenter wondered whether university police would be prohibited from interviewing an accused party in a criminal investigation unless the university provided written notice of the interview. Another commenter requested further guidance from the Department on how schools should handle overlapping enforcement entities, especially regarding the notice requirement and whether an interview with law enforcement would violate Title IX if the police officer conducted the interview before the Title IX Coordinator was able to provide notice of allegations to the respondent.

Several commenters expressed concern about the notice provision interfering with the ability of campus officials to perform investigations concurrently with police. Commenters warned that an institution may inadvertently interfere with an ongoing law enforcement investigation if the institution contacts a respondent or witnesses before law enforcement has had a chance to do so. One commenter asked the Department to clarify that institutions may allow for a temporary delay of notice to the respondent at the request of law enforcement after receipt of a complaint, but before initiation of grievance proceedings.

Discussion: While the Department appreciates commenters' concerns about best practices in conducting criminal investigations, the Department reiterates that a § 106.45 grievance process occurs independently of any criminal investigation that may occur concurrently, and the recipient's obligation to inform the parties of the allegations under investigation is a necessary procedural benefit for both parties. Precisely because schools, colleges, and universities are not law enforcement entities but rather educational institutions, the Department does not intend to require recipients to adopt best practices from law enforcement. For purposes of a fair, impartial investigation into allegations in a formal complaint, the Department believes that providing written notice of the allegations to both parties at the beginning of the investigation best serves the important goal of fostering reliable outcomes in Title IX grievance processes.

The Department understands commenters' concerns that investigators (whether law enforcement or not) may believe that catching a respondent by surprise gets at the truth better than giving a respondent notice of the allegations with sufficient time for the respondent to prepare a response, including by making it less likely that a respondent has time or opportunity to destroy evidence or manipulate testimony. However, the Department agrees with commenters supporting § 106.45(b)(2) who asserted that notice of the allegations is an essential feature of a fair process; without knowing the scope and purpose of an interview a respondent will not have a fair opportunity to seek assistance from an advisor of choice and think through the respondent's view of the alleged facts. The Department declines to require written notice only if a recipient decides to proceed with a formal investigation, because the final regulations require a recipient to investigate the allegations in a formal complaint.[1118] The § 106.45 grievance process does not recognize, or permit a recipient to recognize, a difference between commencing an investigation upon receipt of a formal complaint, and a separate step of ''charging'' the respondent that, by commenters' descriptions, sometimes involves a recipient interviewing parties or witnesses before deciding whether to ''charge'' a respondent and thereby conduct a full investigation. If an investigation reveals facts requiring or permitting dismissal of the formal complaint pursuant to § 106.45(b)(3), the parties have been informed of the formal complaint, the allegations therein, and then the reasons for the dismissal, such that both parties can exercise their right to appeal the dismissal decision.[1119] While a recipient may take steps that the recipient considers part of an ''investigation'' without having received a formal complaint, the recipient may not impose discipline on a respondent without first complying with a grievance process that complies with § 106.45,[1120] which includes providing a party with written notice of the date, time, location, participants, and purpose of all investigative interviews with a party with sufficient time for the party to prepare to participate.[1121] Thus, even if a recipient is not in ''receipt of a formal complaint'' which triggers the recipient's obligation to send the written notice of allegations in § 106.45(b)(2), the recipient cannot impose disciplinary sanctions on a respondent, or take other actions against a respondent that do not fit the definition of ''supportive measures'' in § 106.30, without following the § 106.45 grievance process.

[1118] Section 106.44(a); § 106.45(b)(3)(i).

[1119] The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(8) to expressly grant both parties equal right to appeal a recipient's mandatory or discretionary dismissal decisions.

If a respondent reacts to a notice of allegations by manipulating the respondent's own testimony, or by tampering with evidence, the § 106.45 grievance process provides adequate avenues through which the investigation and adjudication can account for such conduct, so that a respondent's attempt to fabricate or falsify information would be part of the objective evaluation of evidence a decision-maker performs in reaching a determination. For example, if a respondent manufactures a counter-narrative to the allegations, the complainant and the recipient have the opportunity to question the respondent about the respondent's statements and reveal inaccuracies, inconsistencies, or false statements.[1122] Similarly, if a witness crafts or manipulates the witness's own testimony, inaccuracy and untruthfulness can be revealed through questioning of the witness by parties and the recipient. If a respondent reacts to a written notice of allegations by intimidating witnesses, such conduct is prohibited as retaliation under § 106.71.

The Department notes that the § 106.45 grievance process applies only to investigation and adjudication of formal complaints under Title IX, and has no applicability to criminal investigations. Regardless of whether a criminal investigation is conducted by ''campus police'' or other law enforcement officers, the recipient's obligations to comply with § 106.45 apply when a party is interviewed for the purpose of a Title IX grievance process, as opposed to furtherance of a criminal investigation.

The Department recognizes that a recipient's obligation to investigate a formal complaint of sexual harassment may overlap with concurrent law enforcement investigation into the same allegations. Where appropriate, the final regulations acknowledge that potential overlap; for example, by acknowledging concurrent law enforcement activity as ''good cause'' to temporarily delay the § 106.45 grievance process under § 106.45(b)(1)(v). However, the Department emphasizes that a recipient's obligation to investigate and adjudicate promptly and fairly under § 106.45 exists separate and apart from any concurrent law enforcement proceeding, and the recipient therefore must comply with all provisions in § 106.45, including the written notice provision, regardless of whether law enforcement is conducting a concurrent investigation. The Department notes that § 106.45(b)(1)(v) addressing the recipient's designated, reasonably prompt time frames contemplates good cause temporary delays and limited extensions of time frames only after the parties have received the initial written notice of allegations under § 106.45(b)(2), such that concurrent law enforcement activity is not good cause to delay sending the written notice itself.[1123]

Changes: None.

Administrative Burden on Schools

Comments: Many commenters urged the Department to give recipients more flexibility in determining the appropriate timing for sending the written notice of allegations under § 106.45(b)(2). Commenters argued that many complaints require an initial investigation to confirm the identity of the involved parties, to clarify any missing information, and to determine whether Title IX or the campus policy applies, and requiring written notice to the parties right away does not make sense when many complaints turn out to lack merit or not allege Title IX or policy violations. Several commenters asked the Department to provide that recipients must give respondents ''prompt written notice'' instead of ''upon receipt of a formal complaint,'' to give recipients a reasonable amount of time before providing the written notice of allegations.

One commenter asked the Department to make the written notice provision more flexible for smaller universities, because college officials often have a close personal connection with students. One commenter argued that the written notice provision would amount to a disturbing constraint on a campus administrator's authority to respond quickly to allegations. The commenter quoted the Department's commentary in the NPRM that ''when determining how to respond to sexual harassment, recipients have flexibility to employ age-appropriate methods, exercise common sense and good judgment, and take into account the needs of the parties involved,'' but the commenter opined that § 106.45(b)(2) runs contrary to this stated intent.

Other commenters noted that many institutions receive more disclosures of inappropriate conduct than formal complaints, and asserted that in many of those cases, the disclosing student is seeking supportive measures and feels satisfied when those personalized supports are put in place (extensions of time, opportunities to change housing, escorts, etc.). Commenters argued that the written notice provision, by alerting the respondent of a report alleging sexual assault before an investigation has taken place, escalates the matter too early.

Another commenter asserted that, at the onset of an investigation, recipients should have the authority to identify allegations under their policy broadly, and then provide an additional, more specific, notice when the investigation process concludes because the proposed regulations appear to require as many written notices to parties as there are changes to the allegations over the course of an investigation, placing an undue burden on recipients with no clear added value to the transparency of the investigation.

Another commenter argued that § 106.45(b)(2) is burdensome to schools because Title IX already requires schools to file annual proactive notice to parties of the school's grievance procedures. Numerous commenters asserted that the administrative burdens placed on schools by the written notice of allegations provision will incentivize schools to try to avoid legal jeopardy rather than try to achieve school safety.

Discussion: The Department disagrees that § 106.45(b)(2) leaves recipients with insufficient flexibility to respond quickly to allegations or contradicts the intent expressed in the NPRM that [1123] Section 106.45(b)(1)(v) (specifying that where a recipient delays or extends a time frame for good cause, the recipient must send written notice to the complainant and the respondent of the delay or extension and the reasons for the action).

recipients should employ age-appropriate methods, exercise common sense and good judgment, and take into account the needs of the parties involved. The Department reiterates that the written notice of allegations provision applies only after a recipient receives a formal complaint; thus, a recipient need not wait until written notice of allegations has been sent in order to, for example, provide supportive measures to the complainant (or the respondent).[1124] For similar reasons, nothing about § 106.45(b)(2) restricts a recipient's flexibility to implement supportive measures designed to restore or preserve the complainant's equal access to education by taking into account the unique needs of the parties and using common sense and good judgment, and the definition of supportive measures emphasizes that supportive measures are ''individualized services'' reasonably available ''before or after the filing of a formal complaint or where no formal complaint has been filed.'' [1125] With respect to the written notice itself, nothing in § 106.45(b)(2) prescribes how the information in the written notice is phrased, such that recipients are free to employ age-appropriate methods, common sense, and good judgment in choosing how to convey the information required to be included in the written notice.

The Department agrees with commenters who noted that many complainants report sexual harassment seeking supportive measures rather than a formal grievance process, and the Department reiterates that § 106.45 only applies after a recipient has received a formal complaint; a recipient need not send written notice of allegations based on reports, disclosures, or other forms of ''notice'' that charges a recipient with actual knowledge that do not consist of receipt of a formal complaint (and a formal complaint may only be filed by a complainant, or signed by the Title IX Coordinator).[1126]

The Department disagrees that a recipient should have discretion to decide to dismiss formal complaints that are unsubstantiated or otherwise fail to meet some threshold of merit. The Department believes that where a complainant has chosen to file a formal complaint, or the Title IX Coordinator has decided to sign a formal complaint, the recipient must investigate those allegations; determinations about the merits of the allegations must be reached only by following the fair, impartial grievance process designed to reach accurate outcomes. As noted above, the final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(3) to provide for discretionary dismissals on specified grounds, but those grounds do not include a recipient's premature determination that allegations lack merit.

Whether or not many recipients currently provide written notice prior to conducting an interview as part of a Title IX grievance process, the Department believes written notice of allegations with adequate time to prepare for an interview constitutes a core procedural protection important to a fair process. A fundamental element of constitutional due process of law is effective notice that enables the person charged to participate in the proceeding.[1127] The final regulations promote clarity as to recipient's legal obligations, and promote respect for each complainant's autonomy, by distinguishing between a complainant's report of sexual harassment, on the one hand, and the filing of a formal complaint that has initiated a grievance process against a respondent, on the other hand. While the complainant and recipient may discuss the complainant's report of sexual harassment without notifying the respondent (including discussion to decide on appropriate supportive measures), when the complainant files a formal complaint, the respondent must be notified that the respondent is under investigation for the serious conduct defined as ''sexual harassment'' under § 106.30.

The Department understands commenters' assertions that waiting to provide notice of the allegations until after conducting an initial interview prevents a respondent from manipulating the respondent's own statements, and that some recipients' current practices permit the recipient an opportunity to decide after the initial respondent interview whether or not the recipient intends to proceed with the investigation. However, the Department believes that complainants deserve the clarity of knowing that the filing of a formal complaint obligates the recipient to investigate the allegations, and once the respondent is under investigation the respondent must be made aware of the allegations with sufficient time to prepare for an initial interview because ''effective notice'' in time to give the respondent opportunity to tell the respondent's ''version of the events'' helps prevent erroneous outcomes.[1128]

In response to commenters' concerns that the proposed rules did not provide a recipient sufficient leeway to halt investigations that seemed futile, the final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(3)(ii) to provide that a recipient may (in the recipient's discretion) dismiss a formal complaint, or allegations therein, in certain circumstances including where a complainant requests the dismissal (in writing to the Title IX Coordinator), where the respondent is no longer enrolled or employed by the recipient, or where specific circumstances prevent the recipient from meeting the recipient's burden to collect sufficient evidence (for example, where a postsecondary institution complainant has ceased participating in the investigation and the only inculpatory evidence available is the complainant's statement in the formal complaint or as recorded in an interview by the investigator). Similarly, where it turns out that the allegations in a formal complaint do not meet the definition of sexual harassment under § 106.30, or did not occur against a person in the United States, or did not occur in the recipient's education program or activity, § 106.45(b)(3)(i) requires the recipient to dismiss the allegations (though the final regulations clarify that the recipient has discretion to address the allegations through a non-Title IX code of conduct) and notify the parties of the dismissal (which implies that the ''parties'' have already been informed that they are parties via receiving the § 106.45(b)(2) written notice of allegations). However, the fact that [1124] In fact, revised § 106.44(a) obligates recipients to promptly respond to any notice of Title IX sexual harassment (regardless of whether a complainant or Title IX Coordinator also files a formal complaint) by, among other things, promptly offering the complainant supportive measures. We reiterate that no written or signed document, much less a ''formal complaint'' as defined in § 106.30, is required in order to trigger the recipient's response obligations. To emphasize this, we have revised § 106.30 defining ''actual knowledge'' to expressly state that ''notice'' conveying actual knowledge to the recipient (triggering the recipient's response obligations) includes a report to the Title IX Coordinator as described in § 106.8(a), which in turn states that any person may report sexual harassment to the Title IX Coordinator in person, by mail, phone, or email. Section 106.8(b)(2) also requires the recipient to prominently display that contact information for the Title IX Coordinator on the recipient's website.

allegations of sexual harassment were raised in a formal complaint warrant notifying the respondent that those allegations had triggered an investigation, even if the allegations are subsequently dismissed, whether the dismissal is mandatory under § 106.45(b)(3)(i) or discretionary under § 106.45(b)(3)(ii). This gives both parties equal opportunity to appeal the recipient's dismissal decision, or to request that dismissed allegations be addressed under non-Title IX codes of conduct.[1129]

The Department believes that requiring subsequent written notice of allegations when the allegations under investigation change appropriately notifies the parties of a change in the scope of the investigation, and does not believe that this benefit would be achieved by only requiring a follow-up written notice after the investigation has concluded. The Department is requiring recipients to inform the parties of the alleged conduct that potentially constitutes sexual harassment under § 106.30, including certain details about the allegations (to the extent such details are known at the time). Although § 106.45(b)(2) requires subsequent written notice to the parties as the recipient discovers additional potential violations, the Department does not agree with the commenter that this requirement adds ''no clear value'' to the transparency of the investigation or that the benefits of such subsequent notice to the parties is outweighed by the administrative burden to the recipient of generating and sending such notices.[1130] If the respondent is facing an additional allegation, the respondent has a right to know what allegations have become part of the investigation for the same reasons the initial written notice of allegations is part of a fair process, and the complainant deserves to know whether additional allegations have (or have not) become part of the scope of the investigation. This information allows both parties to meaningfully participate during the investigation, for example by gathering and presenting inculpatory or exculpatory evidence (including fact and expert witnesses) relevant to each allegation under investigation.

The Department does not believe that requiring recipients to send written notice of the allegations under investigation will incentivize recipients to care less about school safety than about legal liability. While the written notice provision constitutes a legal obligation, the purpose of the provision is to ensure that parties have critical information about the recipient's investigation; in that way, the obligation to send written notice of the allegations forms part of the recipient's response demonstrating concern about the safety of the recipient's educational environment, not simply a legalistic obligation. Measures that a recipient should take specifically to protect the safety of a complainant, respondent, or members of the recipient's community are unaffected by the recipient's obligation to send written notice of the allegations to the parties. For example, a recipient's non-deliberately indifferent response under § 106.44(a) includes offering supportive measures to complainants, and supportive measures as defined in § 106.30 may be designed to protect a complainant's safety or deter sexual harassment. Under § 106.44(c), a respondent who poses an immediate threat to the physical health or safety of any student or other individual may be removed from the recipient's education program or activity on an emergency basis, with or without a grievance process pending.

Although the Department understands recipients' desire for as much flexibility as possible to design disciplinary proceedings that best meet the needs of a recipient's unique educational community, for the reasons discussed previously the Department believes that providing written notice of the allegations under investigation is not a procedural right that should be left to a recipient's discretion. The final regulations leave recipients flexibility to select the method of delivery of the written notices required under § 106.45(b)(2) (including the initial notice and any subsequent notices), and while the initial notice must be sent ''upon receipt'' of a formal complaint, with ''sufficient time'' for a party to prepare for an initial interview, such provisions do not dictate a specific time frame for sending the notice, leaving recipients flexibility to, for instance, inquire of the complainant details about the allegations that should be included in the written notice that may have been omitted in the formal complaint, and draft the written notice, while bearing in the mind that the entire grievance process must conclude under the recipient's own designated time frames.

Changes: We have revised § 106.45(b)(3) to provide recipients with the discretion to dismiss a formal complaint, or allegations therein, where the complainant notifies the Title IX Coordinator in writing that the complainant wishes to withdraw the formal complaint or allegations, where the respondent is no longer enrolled or employed by the recipient, or where specific circumstances prevent a recipient from gathering evidence sufficient to reach a determination regarding responsibility.

Elementary and Secondary Schools

Comments: Several commenters argued that § 106.45(b)(2) would be harmful to students and administrators at elementary and secondary schools because accusations of sexual assault or abuse are often described without specific details or in a way that makes it difficult to determine whether the alleged misconduct falls under Title IX, under the recipient's code of conduct, or neither. Commenters argued that § 106.45(b)(2) would require school administrators to provide multiple written notices, because an initial description of the misconduct might make it seem like the allegations fall under several different codes of conduct. Another commenter stated that requiring that the respondent be given ''sufficient time for a response before any initial interview'' does not consider the possible threat to the learning environment or the developing nature of a minor's memory. Another commenter asserted that courts do not give elementary and secondary school students due process rights, so the written notice of allegations provision should not apply to elementary and secondary school recipients.

[1129] The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(8) so that parties have the right to appeal any dismissal decision. While some respondents may not desire to appeal a dismissal, other respondents may desire to challenge the recipient's conclusion that, for instance, the conduct alleged did not constitute sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, because if the conduct constitutes Title IX sexual harassment the recipient is not permitted to discipline the respondent without first following the § 106.45 grievance process, which may provide stronger procedural rights and protections than other disciplinary proceedings a recipient might use if the recipient charges the respondent with a non-Title IX code of conduct violation over the allegations.

[1130] Deciding whether additional procedural safeguards are required under constitutional due process of law involves balancing the ''private'' interests at stake (here, the interests of the parties in a recipient reaching an accurate outcome), the administrative burden and cost to the government (here, the recipient) to provide the additional procedure, and the likelihood that the additional procedure may reduce the risk of erroneous outcome. Mathews v. Eldridge, 424 U.S. 319, 334 (1976). The Department believes that consideration of these factors weighs in favor of requiring subsequent written notices to the parties when the allegations change during an investigation: The outcome of a case poses serious consequences for both parties; recipients are not unaccustomed to sending written notices to students (and parents of minor students) for a wide range of activities; and ensuring that the parties' participation throughout the grievance process focuses on the actual allegations being investigated by the recipient significantly reduces the risk of erroneous outcomes.

A few commenters advised changing the written notice provision to account for young complainants and respondents, especially students in preschool and elementary and secondary schools by giving the Title IX Coordinator discretion to communicate to parents or parties over the phone rather than strictly in writing.

Commenters argued that, in elementary and secondary schools addressing peer harassment incidents, the written notice of allegations provision fails to take into account the high volume of low-level incidents schools address and how burdensome and expensive this provision would become for students, parents, and administrators. Commenters argued that this provision would escalate situations from relatively informal to extremely formal, which would be alarming for students and parents. One commenter agreed that the accused student must be afforded due process, including notice of the allegations and an opportunity to respond, but disagreed that the written notice provision should apply to elementary and secondary schools, because it is neither necessary nor reasonable for an elementary and secondary school administrator to send the level of detail required by § 106.45(b)(2) in a written notice for all sexual harassment cases. At least one commenter argued that public elementary and secondary schools in the commenter's State do not have ''codes of conduct'' and instead have policies approved by a board of education pursuant to the commenter's State education code. The commenter stated that the language of § 106.45(b)(2) does not fit the elementary and secondary school setting.

Discussion: The Department reiterates that the recipient need not provide the written notice of allegations under § 106.45(b)(2) unless a formal complaint has been filed; this should reduce commenters' concerns that elementary and secondary schools will be inundated with the need to generate written notices whenever any conduct termed ''sexual harassment'' is reported or that elementary and secondary school administrators will need to send out written notices concerning ''vague'' or ''unspecific'' reports of conduct that may or may not constitute sexual harassment. Further, the Department clarifies that when a formal complaint contains allegations of conduct that could constitute not only sexual harassment defined by § 106.30 but also violations of other codes of conduct, the final regulations have revised the language used in § 106.45(b)(2) to remove confusing references to the recipient's code of conduct and focus this provision on the need to send notice of allegations that could constitute sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30. The Department appreciates the opportunity to clarify here that references in the final regulations to a recipient's ''code of conduct'' refer to any set of policies, rules, or similar codes that purport to govern the conduct or behavior of students or employees, whether such policies, rules, or codes have been crafted by the individual school itself, under mandates from a State or local law, pursuant to school board resolutions, or by other means. Furthermore, § 106.45(b)(2) requires the recipient to include in the written notice ''sufficient details known at the time'' (emphasis added), such that even if a young student describes a sexual harassment incident in a manner that omits precise, specific details, a recipient may still comply with § 106.45(b)(2)(i), and then send subsequent notices as described in § 106.45(b)(2)(ii) as details about allegations may be discovered during the investigation.

The Department notes that § 106.44(c) and § 106.44(d) allow a recipient to remove a respondent from the recipient's education program on an emergency basis, and place a non-student employee on administrative leave during the pendency of an investigation, alleviating commenters' concerns that giving the respondent sufficient time to respond by sending written notice that a grievance process is underway will allow a threat to remain in the educational environment. The recipient is also obligated to offer the complainant supportive measures, including during the pendency of a grievance process, and thus the Department does not believe that requiring written notice to the parties after a formal complaint has been filed restricts a recipient's ability to provide for the safety of parties and deter sexual harassment.[1131]

The Department agrees with commenters that elementary and secondary school recipients, as well as postsecondary recipients, must appropriately address incidents of sexual harassment in order to avoid subjecting students and employees to sex discrimination in violation of Title IX. The Department notes that the Supreme Court has confirmed that public elementary and secondary school students are entitled to due process under the U.S. Constitution in school disciplinary proceedings.[1132] Although commenters are correct that no Supreme Court decision specifically requires written notice when a formal complaint of sexual misconduct has been filed, the Supreme Court has held that ''effective notice'' constitutes an essential element of due process because it allows the person accused to make sure that their ''version of the events'' is heard,[1133] and the Department reasonably has determined that providing written notice of allegations, containing details of the allegations that are known at the time, after a formal complaint has triggered a recipient's obligation to investigate and adjudicate sexual harassment constitutes an important procedural protection for the benefit of all participants in the grievance process, and increases the likelihood that the recipient will reach an accurate determination regarding responsibility, which is necessary to hold recipients accountable for providing remedies to victims of Title IX sexual harassment.

The Department does not believe that the requirement for parties to receive written notice of the allegations needs to be modified when the parties are young. The final regulations revise § 106.8(b) to include parents on the list of persons to whom recipients send notice and information about the recipient's non-discrimination policy and procedures; the final regulations add § 106.6(g) to expressly state that these regulations do not alter the legal right of parents and guardians to exercise rights on behalf of parties; and nothing in the final regulations precludes a Title IX Coordinator from communicating with a young student's parent about the process (including conveying the same information as contained in a written notice) via telephone or in person so long as the written notice meets the requirements of § 106.45(b)(2).

The Department reiterates that the grievance process is initiated (and thus the written notice requirement applies) only when the complainant has filed, or the Title IX Coordinator has signed, a formal complaint. Thus, the written notice requirement does not ''escalate'' an incident; rather, a complainant's choice (or a Title IX Coordinator's decision) has resulted in a formal complaint triggering a grievance process. Only then is the recipient required to send the written notice of allegations under § 106.45(b)(2). Where no formal complaint has been filed by a complainant or signed by a Title IX Coordinator, the recipient is not obligated to ''escalate'' the reported incident by, for example, informing the respondent that the respondent has been reported to be a perpetrator of sexual harassment; a recipient is obligated to keep confidential provision of supportive measures to a complainant (which the recipient must offer to complainants), except as necessary to actually implement the supportive measures (for example, the respondent may need to know the identity of a complainant who has reported the respondent to have perpetrated sexual harassment if the appropriate supportive measure is a no-contact order and the respondent needs to know with whom to avoid communicating under the terms of the order).

Because of the seriousness of the allegations in a formal complaint of sexual harassment, and the access to education that is at stake for both parties in a grievance process addressing those allegations, the Department requires the recipient to allow the parties to meaningfully participate in the grievance process. This participation requires written notice of allegations to both parties where there is a formal complaint, including the details specified in this provision. The Department disagrees that pertinent information such as the identity of the parties involved, location and date of the incident, and the nature of the misconduct that could constitute sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, with ''sufficient details known at the time'' (as § 106.45(b)(2) provides) amounts to an unnecessary or unreasonable amount of detail for recipients to include in a written notice of allegations, including in elementary and secondary schools. The provision's use of the phrases ''known at the time'' and ''if known'' in this provision indicates that the Department understands that not every significant detail will be known in every situation, yet expects the written notice to provide both parties with key information about the alleged incident so that both parties understand the scope of the investigation and can prepare to meaningfully participate by advancing the party's own interests in the outcome of the case. The final regulations also revise § 106.45(b)(2) so that the written notice of allegations also notifies the parties of each party's right to an advisor of choice, further ensuring that parties are prepared to meaningfully participate in a grievance process.

Changes: We have revised § 106.45(b)(2)(ii) to remove references to a recipient's ''code of conduct'' and adds reference to sexual harassment ''as defined in § 106.30'' to reduce confusion among commenters as to whether the written notice requirement applies to allegations that constitute sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30 or to other violations of a recipient's code of conduct. For the same reason, we have revised § 106.45(b)(2)(i) to reference the grievance process ''that complies with § 106.45'' to clarify that the written notice pertains to the grievance process a recipient must follow to comply with Title IX. We have revised § 106.8(a) to include parents and legal guardians of elementary and secondary school students on the list of persons to whom recipients send notice and information about the recipient's non-discrimination policy and procedures. We have added § 106.6(g) to state that nothing in the final regulations alters the legal right of parents or guardians to exercise rights on behalf of a party.

Confidentiality and Anonymity for Complainants

Comments: One commenter suggested that written notice of allegations sent to the parties naming the complainant and listing the details of the allegations could be leaked or forwarded to unrelated third parties, which could damage the respondent's reputation, threaten both parties' access to education, and possibly violate State and Federal health care privacy laws regarding the respondent's or complainant's medical history. Some commenters requested that § 106.45(b)(2) be revised to bar both respondents and complainants from disclosing personally identifiable information except as necessary to prepare a response.

Other commenters believed that § 106.45(b)(2), by sending notice of the formal complaint, exposes complainants to increased scrutiny not applied to students reporting other kinds of student misconduct.

Several commenters wanted the Department to give recipients flexibility to allow complainants to stay anonymous in certain circumstances, and to retain the approach under the 2001 Guidance, which advised that an institution may ''evaluate the confidentiality request'' of a complainant or respondent ''in the context of its responsibility to provide a safe and non-discriminatory environment for all schools,'' [1134] considering factors like the severity of the alleged conduct.

One commenter asserted that there is precedent for including only the initials of parties in the pre-investigation stage of the complaint.[1135] Other commenters argued that respondents do not need to know the complainant's identity to meaningfully participate in the recipient's grievance procedure.

Several commenters argued that it is unfair to complainants to expose the complainant's identity, especially because proposed § 106.44(b)(2) required a Title IX Coordinator to file a formal complaint over the wishes of a complainant where multiple reports had been made against the same respondent. Commenters argued that this could significantly chill a complainant's willingness to report sexual misconduct because the complainant's identity could be revealed to the respondent even when the complainant never even wanted to initiate a grievance process. Commenters wondered whether a Title IX Coordinator must deny requests by complainants to remain anonymous if the Title IX Coordinator elects to file a formal complaint.

Commenters argued that, due to a fear of retaliation, many students are unwilling to report an employee or professor if the student cannot remain anonymous. One commenter stated that, for other types of misconduct allegations, such as theft of property, employees are often questioned without being told who reported them.

Some commenters suggested modifying § 106.45(b)(2) to expressly bar complainants from maintaining anonymity, or to forbid schools from investigating allegations unless complainant agree to identify themselves.

Commenters suggested that § 106.45(b)(2) should be modified to require schools to give the respondent a copy of the complainant's written formal complaint when sending the written notice of allegations, or if the formal complaint was not written then the recipient should send the respondent a verbatim summary of the oral complaint.

Other commenters supported § 106.45(b)(2) and shared personal stories where, as respondents, the commenters could not understand the allegations without knowing the identity of the complainant. For example, one commenter stated that the recipient attempted to inform the respondent of sexual misconduct allegations while also withholding the identity of the complainant and as a result, the respondent spent much of the investigation believing that the allegations centered around a kiss at a party with one person, only to find out after the identity of the complainant was finally revealed that the allegations were actually made by a different person. Other commenters supported § 106.45(b)(2) because while campus sexual misconduct hearings are not criminal cases, they are proceedings with significant and far-reaching consequences, including possible expulsion making it difficult for a respondent to transfer to any other university, and respondents deserve the basic due process right to know details about the allegations. At least one commenter cited a survey of public perceptions of higher education, including topics such as campus sexual assault and due process; in the survey, 81 percent of people agreed that students accused of sexual assault on college campuses should have the right to know the charges against them before being called to defend themselves, which the commenters argued should include the identity of the complainant.[1136]

Discussion: The Department clarifies that recipients (and, as applicable, parties) must follow relevant State and Federal health care privacy laws throughout the grievance process. Nothing in the notice should divulge the complainant's (or respondent's) medical information or other sensitive information, nor does § 106.45(b)(2) require disclosure of such information. To further respond to commenters' concerns about disclosure of medical information, the final regulations add to § 106.45(b)(5)(i) a prohibition against a recipient accessing or using for a grievance process the medical, psychological, and similar records of any party without the party's voluntary, written consent.[1137] If the party is not an ''eligible student,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3, then the recipient must obtain the voluntary, written consent of a ''parent,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3.[1138] The Department agrees with commenters that it is unacceptable for any person to leak or disseminate information to retaliate against another person, and the final regulations add § 106.71, which prohibits the recipient or any other person from intimidating, threatening, coercing, or discriminating against any individual for the purpose of interfering with any right or privilege secured by Title IX. As discussed in this preamble at § 106.45(b)(5)(iii), the parties have a right to discuss the allegations under investigations, but this right does not preclude a recipient from warning the parties not to discuss or disseminate the allegations in a manner that constitutes retaliation or unlawful tortious conduct.

The Department understands commenters' concerns that complaints of other forms of student misconduct may not lead to the same grievance process (for example, the recipient sending a written notice of allegations to both parties) as the process required under these final regulations for Title IX sexual harassment. However, for reasons described above, the Department believes that both parties should have the benefit of understanding how the recipient has framed the scope of a sexual harassment investigation upon receipt of a formal complaint, including sufficient details known at the time, to permit the respondent opportunity to respond to the allegations. The Department disagrees that this results in unwarranted ''scrutiny'' of a complainant, and reiterates that written notice of allegations is required only after a formal complaint has been filed; thus, complainants need not be identified by name to a respondent upon a report of sexual harassment, including for the purpose of obtaining supportive measures.[1139] However, a formal complaint alleging sexual harassment triggers a grievance process, and in the interest of fairness that process must commence with both parties receiving written notice of the pertinent details of the incident under investigation. We have removed proposed § 106.44(b)(2) from these final regulations, which provision would have required a Title IX Coordinator to file a formal complaint upon receiving multiple reports against the same respondent. Removal of that proposed provision reduces the likelihood that a complainant's desire not to file a formal complaint will be overridden by a Title IX Coordinator's decision to sign a formal complaint.

The Department disagrees that using only the initials of the parties (instead of the full names), or withholding the complainant's identity entirely, or requiring both parties to refrain from disclosing each other's personally identifiable information, sufficiently permits the parties to meaningfully participate in the grievance process. The Department reiterates that the written notice of allegations serves both parties' interests. While complainants may often know the identity of a respondent, in some situations a complainant does not know the respondent's identity, but the written notice of allegations provision ensures that if the recipient knows or discovers the respondent's identity, the complainant is informed of that important fact. Further, the complainant's receipt of written notice under this provision ensures that the complainant understands the way in which the recipient has framed the scope of the investigation so that the complainant can meaningfully participate and advance the complainant's own interests throughout the grievance process.[1140]

The Department notes that the written notice of allegations provision does not require listing personally identifiable information of either party beyond the ''identity'' of the parties; thus, the written notice need not, and should not, for example, contain other personally identifiable information such as dates of birth, social security numbers, or home addresses, and nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient from directing parties not to disclose such personally identifiable information.

The Department acknowledges that the final regulations require identification of the parties after a formal complaint has triggered a [1137] Section 106.45(b)(5)(i).

[1138] Id.

[1139] Under § 106.30 defining ''supportive measures'' recipients must keep confidential the provision of supportive measures to a complainant or respondent to the extent that maintaining confidentiality does not impair the ability of the recipient to provide the supportive measures. Thus, unless a particular supportive measure affects the respondent in a way that requires the respondent to know the identity of the complainant (for example, a mutual no-contact order), the Title IX Coordinator need not, and should not, disclose the complainant's identity to the respondent during the process of selecting and implementing supportive measures for the complainant.

[1140] As discussed throughout this preamble, the final regulations: Acknowledge the right of parents or guardians to exercise legal rights to act on behalf of a complainant (or respondent) in § 106.6(g); give both parties the right to select an advisor of choice and revise § 106.45(b)(2) to require the initial notice of allegations to advise parties of that right, and to notify the parties of the recipient's grievance process which includes a description of the range of supportive measures available to complainants and respondents; and forbid recipients from restricting the ability of the parties to discuss the allegations under investigation, in § 106.45(b)(5)(iii), including for the purpose of emotional or personal support, advice, or advocacy. Thus, these final regulations acknowledge that participation in a grievance process is often a difficult circumstance for any party and aim to provide numerous avenues by which a party may receive support, assistance, and advice tailored to the party's individual needs and wishes throughout the grievance process.

grievance process, in a way that the 2001 Guidance did not.[1141] The Department does not believe that anonymity during a grievance process can lead to fair, reliable outcomes, and thus requires party identities (to the extent they are known) to be included in the written notice of allegations. As noted above, where a formal complaint has not been filed by a complainant or signed by a Title IX Coordinator, the final regulations do not require a recipient to disclose a complainant's identity to a respondent (unless needed in order to provide a particular supportive measure, such as a mutual no-contact order where a respondent would need to know the identity of the person with whom the respondent's communication is restricted). In situations where a complainant's life is in danger from the respondent, such a situation may present the kind of immediate threat to physical health or safety that justifies an emergency removal of a respondent under § 106.44(c). Further, nothing in the final regulations affects a complainant's ability to seek emergency protective orders from a court of law. The final regulations also expressly prohibit retaliation, in § 106.71, and recipients must respond to complaints of retaliation in order to protect complainants whose identity has been disclosed as a result of a formal complaint (or, as also discussed herein, where providing supportive measures to the complainant necessitates the respondent knowing the complainant's identity). Thus, in situations where a complainant fears that disclosure to the respondent of the complainant's identity (or the fact that the complainant has filed a formal complaint) poses a risk of retaliation against the complainant, the Title IX Coordinator must discuss available supportive measures and consider the complainant's wishes regarding supportive measures designed to protect the complainant's safety and deter sexual harassment.

The Department understands commenters' concerns that complainants may not want to report misconduct by an employee if the complainant cannot remain anonymous. The Department reiterates that the written notice of allegations identifying the parties to a sexual harassment incident is required only after a formal complaint has been filed by a complainant or signed by a Title IX Coordinator. Complainants, therefore, need not feel dissuaded from reporting sexual harassment by an employee due to a desire for the complainant's identity to be withheld from the respondent, because unless and until a formal complaint is filed, the final regulations do not require a recipient to disclose the complainant's identity to a respondent, including an employee-respondent (unless the respondent must be informed of the complainant's identity in order for the Title IX Coordinator to effectively implement a particular supportive measure that would necessitate the respondent knowing the complainant's identity, such as a no-contact order). The Department understands that some recipients may choose to question an employee-respondent about misconduct, such as stealing or theft, without disclosing to the employee the identity of the person who reported the theft. The Department notes that the final regulations do not prevent a recipient from questioning an employee-respondent about sexual harassment allegations without disclosing the complainant's identity,[1142] provided that the recipient does not take disciplinary action against the respondent without first applying the § 106.45 grievance process (or unless emergency removal is warranted under § 106.44(c), or administrative leave is permitted under § 106.44(d)).

For the reasons already mentioned, the Department declines to require recipients to maintain the anonymity of complainants once a formal complaint has been filed. The Department also will not require recipients to give respondents a copy of the formal complaint. The written notice of allegations provision already requires the recipient to provide the date, time, alleged conduct, and identity of the complainant, so the information required by § 106.45(b)(2) provides sufficient opportunity for the respondent to participate in the grievance process while protecting the complainant's privacy rights to the extent that, for example, the complainant alleged facts in the formal complaint that are unrelated to Title IX sexual harassment and thus do not relate to the allegations that a recipient investigates in the grievance process.

While the Department does not decide policy matters based on public opinion polls, the Department agrees with commenters that informing the respondent of the ''charges against them'' represents a staple of a fair process that increases party and public confidence in the fairness and accuracy of Title IX proceedings, and believes that § 106.45(b)(2) is an important feature of the § 106.45 grievance process.

Changes: The final regulations add § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation against any person for exercising rights under Title IX or for participating (or refusing to participate) in a Title IX grievance process, and revise § 106.45(b)(5)(i) to prevent recipients from using a party's treatment records without the party's (or party's parent, if applicable) voluntary, written consent.

General Modification Suggestions

Comments: Because anything a respondent says may be used against the respondent in subsequent proceedings at an interview regarding sexual assault, including criminal proceedings, one commenter recommended that § 106.45(b)(2) include a statement that, when the allegation against the respondent would constitute a felony in the State in which the accusation is made, the respondent's silence may not be construed as evidence of guilt or responsibility for the allegation.

Another commenter asked the Department to require the Title IX Coordinator to email both the complainant and the respondent at least once a week to let them know of progress, changes, and updates on their case.

Discussion: To make clear that respondents may remain silent in [1141] 2001 Guidance at 17 (''The school should inform the student that a confidentiality request may limit the school's ability to respond. The school also should tell the student that Title IX prohibits retaliation and that, if he or she is afraid of reprisals from the alleged harasser, the school will take steps to prevent retaliation and will take strong responsive actions if retaliation occurs. If the student continues to ask that his or her name not be revealed, the school should take all reasonable steps to investigate and respond to the complainant consistent with the student's request as long as doing so does not prevent the school from responding effectively to the harassment and preventing harassment of other students.''); cf. id. (stating that constitutional due process of law requires recipients that are public institutions to disclose the complainant's identity to the respondent and in such a situation the recipient should honor the complainant's desire for confidentiality and not proceed to discipline the alleged harasser.). The final regulations require identification of the name of the complainant where a formal complaint has been filed by a complainant or signed by a Title IX Coordinator, not only with respect public institutions but also as to private institutions, because constitutional due process and fundamental fairness require the respondent to know the identity of the alleged victim in order to meaningfully respond to the allegations.

[1142] The Department notes that a recipient's questioning of a respondent (whether a student or employee) about a reported sexual harassment incident, in the absence of a formal complaint, may not be used as part of an investigation or adjudication if a formal complaint is later filed by the complainant or signed by the Title IX Coordinator, because § 106.45(b)(5)(v) requires that a party be given written notice of any interview or meeting relating to the allegations under investigation, and a recipient is precluded from imposing disciplinary sanctions on a respondent without following the § 106.45 grievance process.

circumstances in which answering a question might implicate a respondent's constitutional right to avoid self-incrimination, and to protect other rights of the parties, § 106.6(d)(2) states that nothing in Title IX requires a recipient to deprive a person of any rights that would otherwise be protected from government action under the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments of the U.S. Constitution. The final regulations also add to § 106.45(b)(6)(i) a provision that the decision-maker must not draw inferences about the determination regarding responsibility based on a party's failure or refusal to appear at the hearing or answer cross-examination questions.

The Department declines to follow the commenter's recommendation to require the Title IX Coordinator to email both the complainant and the respondent at least once a week to let them know of progress, changes, and updates on their case. The recipient has discretion to be more responsive than the final regulations require, but the final regulations do not require the recipient to contact the parties at least once a week. The Department notes that the final regulations require the recipient to send notice to the parties regarding essential case developments such as where additional allegations become part of the investigation; where allegations or the entire formal complaint have been dismissed; where any short-term delay or time frame extension has been granted for good cause; and after the determination regarding responsibility has been made.

Changes: The final regulations also add to § 106.45(b)(6)(i) a provision that the decision-maker must not draw inferences about the determination regarding responsibility based on a party's failure or refusal to appear at the hearing or answer cross-examination questions.

General Clarification Requests

Comments: Several commenters requested that the Department clarify what ''sufficient time [for the respondent] to prepare a response'' means. Likewise, several commenters asked that the Department clarify when a recipient must provide notice of any additional allegations to the parties, asserting that § 106.45(b)(2) does not define ''upon receipt,'' but that if read literally, that phrase could suggest ''immediately upon receipt,'' which is impossible in light of the detailed information that must be provided in the written notice. One commenter suggested a definitive guideline (e.g., at least five workdays after receipt) should be imposed. Commenters asserted that ascertaining what the allegations are or how they should be phrased is not always obvious ''upon receipt'' of a formal complaint; a degree of fact-finding and/or analysis must be conducted first. One commenter argued that the provision should set forth a reasonable time frame for institutions to evaluate the information provided in a formal complaint before issuing the notice described in 106.45(b)(2)(i). Another commenter asked the Department to explain the consequences to universities of violating § 106.45(b)(2).

Discussion: The Department understands commenters' concerns that sometimes preparing a written notice of the allegations requires time for the recipient to intake a formal complaint and then compile the details required for a written notice. The Department will not interpret this provision to require notice to be provided ''immediately'' (and the provision does not use that word), but rather notice must be provided early enough to allow the respondent ''sufficient time to prepare a response.'' The Department also notes that a recipient's discretion in this regard is constrained by a recipient's obligation to conduct a grievance process within the recipient's designated, reasonably prompt time frames, such that waiting to send the written notice of allegations (even without yet conducting initial interviews with parties) could result in the recipient failing to meet time frames applicable to its grievance process. Whether the recipient provided the respondent ''sufficient time'' under § 106.45(b)(2) is a fact-specific determination. Consequences for failing to comply with the final regulations include enforcement action by the Department requiring the recipient to come into compliance by taking remedial actions the Department deems necessary, consistent with 20 U.S.C. 1682, and potentially placing the recipient's Federal funding at risk.

Changes: None.

Dismissal and Consolidation of Formal Complaints

Section 106.45(b)(3)(i) Mandatory Dismissal of Formal Complaints

Comments: Many commenters supported proposed § 106.45(b)(3) because it obligates recipients to investigate only allegations in a formal complaint, and thus provides the victim with control over whether or not to trigger the formal grievance process by filing a formal complaint. Other commenters appreciated how clear this provision was for recipients to follow. Some commenters sought clarification with respect to the practical application of this provision, such as what standard would schools be held to if they initiate proceedings on their own, but were not required to do so under Title IX. Certain commenters asked whether a respondent could claim that the school failed to comply with the proposed regulations and thus violated respondent's rights if the school used separate proceedings because the respondent's alleged conduct did not satisfy the three requirements in § 106.44(a) and § 106.45(b)(3)(i). Other commenters asked whether a respondent can use the dismissal provision to demand that a school dismiss a complaint against the respondent.

In contrast, several comments recommended that the Department remove any provision requiring dismissal of certain complaints so that recipients retain institutional flexibility to investigate complaints at their own discretion. Many commenters expressed the belief that schools should investigate each and every claim and refrain from making an initial determination (some viewed this initial determination as requiring individuals to make a prima facie case) of whether the alleged conduct satisfied the § 106.30 definition of sexual harassment. At least one commenter believed that schools should not have to dismiss even when a victim is not actually harmed. Another commenter stated that the proposed rules provided no avenue for reviewing or appealing a recipient's determination as to whether the alleged conduct satisfies the definition of sexual harassment. Commenters asserted that the Department has no authority to forbid or preclude schools from investigating non-Title IV matters that affect their institutions, but only the authority to require schools to respond to sexual harassment. Several commenters also urged the Department to transform the provision from a mandatory provision to a permissive provision by replacing ''must'' with ''may.'' Many commenters opposed the dismissal provision believing that the provision required institutions to always dismiss or ignore allegations that occurred off-campus. Several commenters cited the concern that dismissing a large number of off-campus complaints will disincentivize reporting by students altogether, forcing students to go to police departments instead.

Combined with urging the Department to expand the definition of sexual harassment in § 106.30 or alter the ''education program or activity'' jurisdictional requirement in § 106.44(a) for fear that recipients will be required to dismiss too many complaints, many commenters argued that the mandatory dismissal language in § 106.45(b)(3) effectively foreclosed recipients from addressing sexual harassment that harms students at alarming rates (e.g., harassment that is severe but not pervasive, or sexual assaults of students, by other students, that occur outside the recipient's education program or activity) even voluntarily (or under State laws) under a recipient's non-Title IX codes of conduct.

Some commenters argued that the language in § 106.45(b)(3) was inconsistent with the language of § 106.44(a) because proposed § 106.45(b)(3) omitted reference to conduct that occurred ''against a person in the United States.''

Discussion: We appreciate commenters' support for this provision's requirement that recipients must investigate allegations in a formal complaint, and agree that this provides complainants with autonomy over choosing to file a formal complaint that triggers an investigation. We acknowledge those comments expressing the concern that as proposed, § 106.45(b)(3) effectively required recipients to make an initial determination as to whether the alleged conduct satisfies the definition of sexual harassment in § 106.30 and whether it occurred within the recipient's education program or activity, and to dismiss complaints based on that initial determination, leaving recipients, complainants, and respondents unclear about whether dismissed allegations could be handled under a recipient's non-Title IX code of conduct. As discussed below, we have revised § 106.45(b)(3)(i) to mirror the conditions listed in § 106.44(a) (by adding ''against a person in the United States''), and we have added language to clarify that the mandatory dismissal in this provision is only for Title IX purposes and does not preclude a recipient from responding to allegations under a recipient's non-Title IX codes of conduct.

We are also persuaded by commenters who expressed concern that the proposed rules did not provide an avenue for reviewing or appealing a recipient's initial determination to dismiss allegations under this provision, and we have revised § 106.45(b)(3)(iii) to require the recipient to notify the parties of a dismissal decision, and we have revised § 106.45(b)(8) to give both parties equal right to appeal a dismissal decision.

The § 106.45 grievance process obligates recipients to investigate and adjudicate allegations of sexual harassment for Title IX purposes; the Department does not have authority to require recipients to investigate and adjudicate misconduct that is not covered under Title IX, nor to preclude a recipient from handling misconduct that does not implicate Title IX in the manner the recipient deems fit. In response to commenters' concerns, the final regulations clarify that dismissal is mandatory where the allegations, if true, would not meet the Title IX jurisdictional conditions (i.e., § 106.30 definition of sexual harassment, against a person in the United States, in the recipient's education program or activity), reflecting the same conditions that trigger a recipient's response under § 106.44(a). The criticism of many commenters was well-taken as to the lack of clarity in the proposed rules regarding a recipient's discretion to address allegations subject to the mandatory dismissal through non-Title IX code of conduct processes. The final regulations therefore revise § 106.45(b)(3)(i) to expressly state (emphasis added) that ''the recipient must dismiss the formal complaint with regard to that conduct for purposes of sexual harassment under title IX or this part; such a dismissal does not preclude action under another provision of the recipient's code of conduct.'' The Department notes that recipients retain the flexibility to employ supportive measures in response to allegations of conduct that does not fall under Title IX's purview, as well as to investigate such conduct under the recipient's own code of conduct at the recipient's discretion. This clarifies that the Department does not intend to dictate how a recipient responds with respect to conduct that does not meet the conditions specified in § 106.44(a). For similar reasons, the Department does not believe that it has the authority to make dismissal optional by changing ''must dismiss'' to ''may dismiss'' because that change would imply that if a recipient chose not to dismiss allegations about conduct that does not meet the conditions specified in § 106.44(a), the Department would nonetheless hold the recipient accountable for following the prescribed grievance process, but the § 106.45 grievance process is only required for conduct that falls under Title IX. The Department therefore retains the mandatory dismissal language in this provision and adds the clarifying language described above. Thus, these final regulations leave recipients discretion to address allegations of misconduct that do not trigger a recipient's Title IX response obligations due to not meeting the Section 106.30 definition of sexual harassment, not occurring in the recipient's education program or activity, or not occurring against a person in the U.S.

Changes: We are revising § 106.45(b)(3)(i) to add ''against a person in the United States'' to align this provision with the conditions stated in § 106.44(a). We are also revising § 106.45(b)(3)(i) to clarify that a mandatory dismissal under this provision is a dismissal for purposes of Title IX and does not preclude action under another provision of the recipient's code of conduct. We add § 106.45(b)(3)(iii) to require recipients to send the parties written notice of any dismissal decision, and we have revised § 106.45(b)(8) to give both parties equal rights to appeal a recipient's dismissal decisions.

Section 106.45(b)(3)(ii)–(iii) Discretionary Dismissals/Notice of Dismissal

Comments: Some commenters suggested that the Department provide greater flexibility to institutions to decide whether or not a full investigation is merited. For instance, some commenters suggested that in circumstances involving a frivolous accusation, a matter that has already been investigated, complaints by multiple complainants none of whom are willing to participate in the grievance process, or when there has been an unreasonable delay in filing that could prejudice the respondent, the Department should grant institutions greater flexibility to determine whether or not to start or continue a formal investigation. At least one commenter suggested that, if greater flexibility were provided, institutions should also be required to document why they did not choose to conduct a formal investigation. Other commenters requested that the Department expand victims' options for institutional responses to include non-adversarial choices.

Discussion: We are persuaded by the commenters urging the Department to grant recipients greater discretion and flexibility to dismiss formal complaints under certain circumstances. Accordingly, we are revising § 106.45(b)(3) to permit discretionary dismissals. Specifically, the Department is adding § 106.45(b)(3)(ii), which allows (but does not require) recipients to dismiss formal complaints in three specified circumstances: Where a complainant notifies the Title IX Coordinator in writing that the complainant would like to withdraw the formal complaint or any allegations therein; where the respondent is no longer enrolled or employed by the recipient; or where specific circumstances prevent the recipient from gathering evidence sufficient to reach a determination as to the allegations contained in the formal complaint.

The Department believes that § 106.45(b)(3)(ii) reaffirms the autonomy of complainants and their ability to choose to remove themselves from the formal grievance process at any point, while granting recipients the discretion to proceed with an investigation against a respondent even where the complainant has requested that the formal complaint or allegations be withdrawn (for example, where the recipient has gathered evidence apart from the complainant's statements and desires to reach a determination regarding the respondent's responsibility). By granting recipients the discretion to dismiss in situations where the respondent is no longer a student or employee of the recipient, the Department believes this provision appropriately permits a recipient to make a dismissal decision based on reasons that may include whether a respondent poses an ongoing risk to the recipient's community, whether a determination regarding responsibility provides a benefit to the complainant even where the recipient lacks control over the respondent and would be unable to issue disciplinary sanctions, or other reasons.[1143] The final category of discretionary dismissals addresses situations where specific circumstances prevent a recipient from meeting the recipient's burden to collect evidence sufficient to reach a determination regarding responsibility; for example, where a complainant refuses to participate in the grievance process (but also has not decided to send written notice stating that the complainant wishes to withdraw the formal complaint), or where the respondent is not under the authority of the recipient (for instance because the respondent is a non-student, non-employee individual who came onto campus and allegedly sexually harassed a complaint), and the recipient has no way to gather evidence sufficient to make a determination, this provision permits dismissal. The Department wishes to emphasize that this provision is not the equivalent of a recipient deciding that the evidence gathered has not met a probable or reasonable cause threshold or other measure of the quality or weight of the evidence, but rather is intended to apply narrowly to situations where specific circumstances prevent the recipient from meeting its burden in § 106.45(b)(5)(i) to gather sufficient evidence to reach a determination. Accordingly, a recipient should not apply a discretionary dismissal in situations where the recipient does not know whether it can meet the burden of proof under § 106.45(b)(5)(i). Decisions about whether the recipient's burden of proof has been carried must be made in accordance with §§ 106.45(b)(6)–(7)—not prematurely made by persons other than the decision-maker, without following those adjudication and written determination requirements.

The Department declines to authorize a discretionary dismissal for ''frivolous'' or ''meritless'' allegations because many commenters have expressed to the Department well-founded concerns that complainants have faced disbelief or skepticism when reporting sexual harassment, and the Department believes that where a complainant has filed a formal complaint, the recipient must be required to investigate the allegations without dismissing based on a conclusion that the allegations are frivolous, meritless, or otherwise unfounded, because the point of the § 106.45 grievance process is to require the recipient to gather and objectively evaluate relevant evidence before reaching conclusions about the merits of the allegations. In making the revisions to § 106.45(b)(3)(ii) authorizing three grounds for a discretionary dismissal of a formal complaint (or allegations therein), the Department believes it is reaching a fair balance between obligating the recipient to fully investigate all allegations that a complainant has presented in a formal complaint, with the recognition that certain circumstances render completion of an investigation futile. Because these three grounds for dismissal are discretionary rather than mandatory, the recipient retains discretion to take into account the unique facts and circumstances of each case before reaching a dismissal decision.

Finally, we are also persuaded by commenters' recommendations that the Department offer the parties an appeal from a recipient's dismissal decisions. The final regulations add § 106.45(b)(3)(iii) requiring that the recipient promptly send the parties written notice so that the parties know when a formal complaint (or allegations therein) has been dismissed (whether under mandatory dismissal, or discretionary dismissal), including the reason for the dismissal. This requirement promotes a fair process by informing both parties of recipient's actions during the grievance process particularly as to a matter as significant as a dismissal of a formal complaint (or allegations therein). Including an explicit notice requirement under this provision is also consistent with the Department's goal of providing greater clarity and transparency as to a recipient's obligations and what the parties to a formal grievance process can expect. The final regulations also revise the appeals provision at § 106.45(b)(8) to allow the parties equal opportunity to appeal any dismissal decision of the recipient.

Changes: The Department is adding § 106.45(b)(3)(ii) to specify three situations where a recipient is permitted but not required to dismiss a formal complaint: Where a complainant notifies the Title IX Coordinator in writing that the complainant would like to withdraw the formal complaint or any allegations therein; where the respondent is no longer enrolled or employed by the recipient; or where specific circumstances prevent the recipient from gathering evidence sufficient to reach a determination as to the allegations contained in the formal complaint. The Department is also adding § 106.45(b)(3)(iii) to require a recipient to notify the parties, in writing, as to any mandatory or discretionary dismissal and reasons for the dismissal. We also revise the appeals provision at § 106.45(b)(8) to allow the parties equal opportunity to appeal any dismissal decision of the recipient.

Section 106.45(b)(4) Consolidation of Formal Complaints

Comments: One commenter suggested revising references to ''both parties'' to ''all parties'' to account for incidents that involve more than two parties. One commenter criticized the proposed rules for seeming to contemplate that sexual harassment incidents only involve a single victim and a single perpetrator and failing to acknowledge that the process may involve multiple groups of people on either side. Another [1143] The Department notes that the Elementary and Secondary Education Act of 1965 (ESEA), as amended by the Every Student Succeeds Act (ESSA), may require a recipient subject to ESEA to take certain steps with respect to an employee who has been accused of sexual misconduct and that continuing a Title IX sexual harassment investigation even when the accused employee has left the recipient's employ may assist the recipient in knowing whether the recipient does, or does not, have probable cause to believe the employee engaged in sexual misconduct. E.g., https://www2.ed.gov/policy/elsec/leg/essa/section8546dearcolleagueletter.pdf.

commenter asked the Department to explain how a single incident involving multiple parties would be handled. A few commenters asserted that some recipients have a practice of not allowing a respondent to pursue a counter-complaint against an original complainant, resulting in what one commenter characterized as an unfair rule that amounts to ''first to file, wins.''

Discussion: In response to commenters' concerns that the proposed rules did not sufficiently provide clarity about situations involving multiple parties, and in response to commenters who asserted that recipients have not always understood how to handle a complaint filed by one party against the other party, the Department adds § 106.45(b)(4), addressing consolidation of formal complaints. The Department believes that recipients and parties will benefit from knowing that recipients have discretion to consolidate formal complaints in situations that arise out of the same facts or circumstances and involve more than one complainant, more than one respondent, or what amount to counter-complaints by one party against the other. Section 106.45(b)(4) further clarifies that where a grievance process involves more than one complainant or respondent, references to the singular ''party,'' ''complainant'' or ''respondent'' include the plural.

Changes: The final regulations add § 106.45(b)(4) to give recipients discretion to consolidate formal complaints of sexual harassment where the allegations of sexual harassment arise out of the same facts or circumstances. Where a grievance process involves more than one complainant or more than one respondent, references in § 106.45 to the singular ''party,'' ''complainant,'' or ''respondent'' include the plural, as applicable.

Investigation

Section 106.45(b)(5)(i) Burdens of Proof and Gathering Evidence Rest on the Recipient

Comments: Some commenters supported this provision based on personal stories involving the recipient placing the burden of proof on a party when the party had no rights to interview witnesses or inspect locations involved in the incident. One commenter supported this provision because it is entirely appropriate that complainants not be assigned the burden of proof or burden of producing evidence since they are seeking equal access to education and it is the school that should provide equal access, and removing these burdens from the shoulders of the respondent is also an important part of the accused's presumption of innocence. One commenter supported placing the burden of proof on the recipient because it is always the school's responsibility to ensure compliance with Title IX.

Some commenters believe that placing the burden of proof on the recipient is tantamount to putting it on the survivor(s) to prove all the elements of the assault, which is an impossible burden and which will deter survivor(s) from reporting and recovering from the assault. One commenter supported placing the burden of gathering evidence on the recipient but not the burden of proof because the recipient is not a party to the proceeding. Some commenters expressed concern that this provision of the final regulations will cause instability in the system because placing the burden of gathering evidence on the recipient suggests an adversarial rather than educational process and opens recipients up to charges that the recipient failed to do enough to gather evidence. Various commenters also contended that this provision of the final regulations is too strict and demanding. Some commenters suggested that Title IX requires only that an institution demonstrate that it did not act with deliberate indifference when it had actual knowledge of sexual harassment or sexual assault—not proving whether each factual allegation in a complaint has merit—and that requiring a recipient to prove each allegation is a burden that Title IX itself has not imposed on recipients.

Some commenters suggested explaining what the recipient can and cannot do in pursuit of gathering evidence, or limiting the recipient's burden to gathering evidence ''reasonably available.'' Other commenters suggested requiring the recipient to investigate all reasonable leads and interview all witnesses identified by the parties.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support for § 106.45(b)(5)(i). The Department agrees with commenters who asserted that the recipient is responsible for ensuring equal access to education programs and activities and should not place the burden of gathering relevant evidence, or meeting a burden of proof, on either party; Title IX obligates recipients to operate education programs and activities free from sex discrimination, and does not place burdens on students or employees who are seeking to maintain the equal educational access that recipients are obligated to provide. The Department believes that § 106.45(b)(5)(i) is important to providing a fair process to both parties by taking the burden of factually determining which situations require redress of sexual harassment off the shoulders of the parties. At the same time, the final regulations ensure that parties may participate fully and robustly in the investigation process, by gathering evidence, presenting fact and expert witnesses, reviewing the evidence gathered, responding to the investigative report that summarizes relevant evidence, and asking questions of other parties and witnesses before a decision-maker has reached a determination regarding responsibility.

The Department disagrees that § 106.45(b)(5)(i) places a de facto burden of proof on the complainant to prove the elements of an alleged assault, and disagrees that this provision is likely to chill reporting. To the contrary, this provision clearly prevents a recipient from placing that burden on a complainant (or a respondent). The Department disagrees that the recipient should bear the burden of producing evidence yet not bear the burden of proof at the adjudication; the Department recognizes that the recipient is not a party to the proceeding, but this does not prevent the recipient from presenting evidence to the decision-maker, who must then objectively evaluate relevant evidence (both inculpatory and exculpatory) and reach a determination regarding responsibility. Nothing about having to carry the burden of proof suggests that the recipient must desire or advocate for meeting (or not meeting) the burden of proof; to the contrary, the final regulations contemplate that the recipient remains objective and impartial throughout the grievance process, as emphasized by requiring a recipient's Title IX personnel involved in a grievance process to serve free from bias and conflicts of interest and to be trained in how to serve impartially and how to conduct a grievance process.[1144] Whether the evidence gathered and presented by the recipient (i.e., gathered by the investigator and with respect to relevant evidence, summarized in an investigative report) does or does not meet the burden of proof, the recipient's obligation is the same: To respond to the determination regarding responsibility by complying with § 106.45 (including effectively implementing remedies for the complainant if the respondent is determined to be responsible).[1145]

[1144] Section 106.45(b)(1)(iii).

[1145] Section 106.45(b)(1)(i); § 106.45(b)(7)(iv).

The Department recognizes that bearing the burden of proof may seem uncomfortable for recipients who do not wish to place themselves ''between'' two members of their community or be viewed as prosecutors adversarial to the respondent. The Department does not believe that this provision makes Title IX proceedings more adversarial; rather, these proceedings are inherently adversarial, often involving competing plausible narratives and high stakes for both parties, and recipients are obligated to identify and address sexual harassment that occurs in the recipient's education program or activity. The final regulations do not require a recipient to take an adversarial posture with respect to either party, and in fact require impartiality. Ultimately, however, the recipient itself must take action in response to the determination regarding responsibility that directly affects both parties, and it is the recipient's burden to impartially gather evidence and present it so that the decision-maker can determine whether the recipient (not either party) has shown that the weight of the evidence reaches or falls short of the standard of evidence selected by the recipient for making determinations. The Department is aware that the final regulations contemplate a recipient fulfilling many obligations that, while performed by several different individuals, are legally attributable to the recipient itself. However, this does not mean that the recipient, having appropriately designated individuals to perform certain roles in fulfillment of the recipient's obligations, cannot meet a burden to gather and collect evidence, present the evidence to a decision-maker, and reach a fair and accurate determination. Thus, the Department disagrees that this provision is too strict or demanding.

The Department agrees that the Supreme Court framework for private Title IX litigation applies a deliberate indifference standard to known sexual harassment (including reports or allegations of sexual harassment). As explained in the ''Adoption and Adaption of the Supreme Court's Framework to Address Sexual Harassment'' section of this preamble, the Department intentionally adopts that framework, and adapts it for administrative enforcement purposes so that these final regulations hold a recipient liable not only when the recipient may be deemed to have intentionally committed sex discrimination (i.e., by being deliberately indifferent to actual knowledge of actionable sexual harassment) but also when a recipient has violated regulatory obligations that, while they may not purport to represent definitions of sex discrimination are required in order to further Title IX's non-discrimination mandate. One of the ways in which the Department adapts that framework is concluding that where a complainant wants a recipient to investigate allegations, the recipient must conduct an investigation and adjudication, and provide remedies to that complainant if the respondent is found responsible. While this response may or may not be required in private Title IX lawsuits, the Department has determined that a consistent, fair grievance process to resolve sexual harassment allegations, under the conditions prescribed in the final regulations, effectuates the purpose of Title IX to provide individuals with effective protections against discriminatory practices.

The Department appreciates commenters' suggestions that this provision be narrowed (e.g., to state that the burden is to gather evidence ''reasonably available'') or broadened (e.g., to require investigation of ''all'' leads or interviews of all witnesses), or to further specify steps a recipient must take to gather evidence. The Department believes that the scope of § 106.45(b)(5)(i) appropriately obligates a recipient to undertake a thorough search for relevant facts and evidence pertaining to a particular case, while operating under the constraints of conducting and concluding the investigation under designated, reasonably prompt time frames and without powers of subpoena. Such conditions limit the extensiveness or comprehensiveness of a recipient's efforts to gather evidence while reasonably expecting the recipient to gather evidence that is available.

Changes: None.

Section 106.45(b)(5)(ii) Equal Opportunity To Present Witnesses and Other Inculpatory/Exculpatory Evidence

Comments: Many commenters supported § 106.45(b)(5)(ii), asserting that it will provide equal opportunity for the parties to present witnesses and other evidence. Commenters stated that this provision will make the grievance process clearer, provide more reliable outcomes, and afford participants important due process protections. One commenter asserted that this provision will create greater uniformity between Title IX regulations and other justice systems in the U.S. designed to deal with similar issues. This commenter also asserted that this provision will reduce the risk of a false positive guilty finding for an innocent student accused of sexual harassment.

At the same time, one commenter expressed concerns that allowing respondents to hear the complainant's evidence and learn the identity of the complainants' witnesses will enable the respondent to intimidate the complainant, intimidate the complainant's witnesses, or spread lies about the complainant. Another commenter argued that previous guidance and regulations already allowed for schools to give each party a chance to present evidence, so the proposed rules are superfluous.

Several commenters recounted personal stories about Title IX Coordinators failing to consider a respondent's exculpatory evidence, including refusing to ask questions the respondent wished to ask the complainant or the complainant's witnesses, and refusing to speak with the respondent's witnesses. One commenter submitted a personal story about the recipient never providing the respondent with the complainant's evidence, which the commenter contended severely hindered the respondent's ability to defend against the complainant's allegations.

One commenter stated approvingly that a provision similar to § 106.45(b)(5)(ii) also appears in the Harvard Law School Sexual and Gender-Based Harassment Policy, under which all parties are afforded due process protections, including the right to present evidence and witnesses at a live hearing before an impartial decision maker. Another commenter suggested that § 106.45(b)(5)(ii) should give the parties an equal opportunity to identify witnesses.

One commenter believed that the provision is consistent with the Sixth Amendment right to confront adverse witnesses, call favorable witnesses, as well as the right to effective assistance of counsel. The commenter argued that some universities have a practice refusing respondents the assistance of counsel, which meant that a young person must defend against trained, seasoned Title IX Coordinators who often serve as the investigator (and sometimes also the decision-maker) in a case. The commenter also cited numerous situations of students being prevented from introducing exculpatory evidence ostensibly on the basis of the complex rules of evidence applied in courtrooms that universities purport to apply to Title IX proceedings, yet universities selectively apply court-based evidentiary rules in ways designed to disadvantage respondents. Commenters asserted that universities allow hearsay and other evidence into Title IX proceedings under the argument that the hearings are an ''informal'' or an ''educational'' process where more relaxed rules are applied, yet do not carefully apply all the court evidentiary rules that ensure hearsay evidence is reliable before being admissible, and at the same time refuse to allow respondents to cross-examine witnesses who are making non-hearsay statements at a hearing.

One commenter asked the Department to require recipients to provide training materials to parties upon request. The commenter requested that the training materials must explain what evidence may or may not be considered in light of what the commenter believed is bias that most Title IX Coordinators hold in favor of victims.

Discussion: The Department agrees with commenters who asserted that § 106.45(b)(5)(ii) will improve the grievance process for all parties, and appreciates references to the beneficial impact of other laws and policies (including Department guidance) that include similar provisions.[1146] The Department acknowledges the personal experiences shared by commenters describing instances in which recipients have ignored, discounted, or denied opportunities to introduce exculpatory evidence, and the Department also acknowledges that other commenters recounted personal experiences involving recipients ignoring, discounting, or denying opportunity to introduce inculpatory evidence (by, for example, showing evidence to a respondent or respondent's attorney without showing it to the complainant). The Department appreciates that many recipients already require Title IX personnel to allow both parties equal opportunity to present evidence and witnesses, but in light of commenters' anecdotal evidence and for reasons discussed in the ''Role of Due Process in the Grievance Process'' section of this preamble, the reality and perception is that too many recipients fail to consider inculpatory or exculpatory evidence resulting in real and perceived injustices for complainants and respondents. Equal opportunity to present inculpatory evidence and exculpatory evidence, including fact witnesses and expert witnesses, is an important procedural right and protection for both parties, and will improve the reliability and legitimacy of the outcomes recipients reach in Title IX sexual harassment grievance processes.

The Department received numerous comments expressing concern about the potential for retaliation and recounting experiences of retaliation suffered by complainants and respondents. The Department has added § 106.71 in these final regulations, explicitly prohibiting any person from intimidating, threatening, coercing, or discriminating against another individual for the purpose of interfering with any right or privilege secured by Title IX. The retaliation provision also requires that the identities of complainants, respondents, and witnesses must be kept confidential, except as permitted by FERPA, required by law, or to the extent necessary to carry out a Title IX grievance process. Section 106.71 also authorizes parties to file complaints alleging retaliation under § 106.8(c) which requires recipients to adopt and publish grievance procedures that provide for the prompt and equitable resolution of complaints of sex discrimination. The Department believes that this provision will deter retaliation, as well as afford parties and the recipient the opportunity promptly to redress retaliation that does occur.

In response to commenters who asserted that recipients should specify in their materials used to train Title IX personnel what evidence is relevant or admissible, we have revised § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to require a recipient's investigators and decision-makers to receive training on issues of relevance,[1147] including for a decision-maker training on when questions about a complainant's prior sexual history are deemed ''not relevant'' under § 106.45(b)(6). Section 106.45(b)(1)(iii) continues to require training on how to conduct an investigation and grievance process, such that each aspect of a recipient's procedural rules (including evidentiary rules) that a recipient must adopt in order to comply with these regulations, and any additional rules that are consistent with these final regulations,[1148] must be included in the training for a recipient's Title IX personnel. Further, if a recipient trains Title IX personnel to evaluate, credit, or assign weight to types of relevant, admissible evidence, that topic will be reflected in the recipient's training materials. The Department agrees with commenters who urged the Department to require that the recipients publicize their training materials, because such a requirement will improve the transparency of a recipient's grievance process. Accordingly, the Department requires recipients to make materials used to train a recipient's Title IX personnel publicly available on recipients' websites, under § 106.45(b)(10).

Changes: We are revising § 106.45(b)(5)(ii) to require recipients to provide an equal opportunity for all parties to present both fact and expert witnesses. We are also revising § 106.45(b)(10) to require recipients to make the materials used to train Title IX personnel publicly available on recipients' websites or, if a recipient does not have a website, available upon request for inspection by members of the public. We have also added § 106.71 to the final regulations to expressly prohibit retaliating against any individual for exercising rights under Title IX.

Comments: One commenter requested the Department to modify § 106.45(b)(5)(ii) to expressly allow a party's mental health history to be introduced as evidence. One commenter argued that the respondent should be permitted to admit as evidence instances where the complainant had accused other students of sexual misconduct in the past. One commenter argued that complainants often receive the benefit of certain types of evidence, such as hearsay and victim impact statements, while respondents are denied the use of the same evidence and arguments. The commenter asked the Department to level the playing field by allowing respondents to write their own [1146] As discussed throughout this preamble, including in the ''Support and Opposition for the Grievance Process in the § 106.45 Grievance Process'' and the ''Role of Due Process in the Grievance Process'' sections of this preamble, the Department has considered grievance procedures in use by particular recipients, prescribed under various State and other Federal laws, recommended by advocacy organizations, and from other sources, and has intentionally crafted the § 106.45 grievance process to contain those procedural rights and protections that best serve Title IX's non-discrimination mandate, comport with constitutional due process and fundamental fairness, and may reasonably be implemented in the context of an educational institution as opposed to courts of law.

[1147] For discussion of these final regulations' requirement that relevant evidence, and only relevant evidence, must be objectively evaluated to reach a determination regarding responsibility, and the specific types of evidence that these final regulations deem irrelevant or excluded from consideration in a grievance process (e.g., a complainant's prior sexual history, any party's medical, psychological, and similar records, any information protected by a legally recognized privilege, and (as to adjudications by postsecondary institutions), party or witness statements that have not been subjected to cross-examination at a live hearing, see the ''Hearings'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble.

[1148] The revised introductory sentence of § 106.45(b) expressly allows recipients to adopt rules that apply to the recipient's grievance process, other than those required under § 106.45, so long as such additional rules apply equally to both parties. For example, a postsecondary institution recipient may adopt reasonable rules of order and decorum to govern the conduct of live hearings.

impact statement and present evidence such as the results of lie detector tests if the hearing allows complainants the use of similar evidence. Another commenter asked the Department to direct recipients to exclude irrelevant evidence.

One commenter suggested that, at the initial complaint stage, complainants should be able to present additional evidence to prevent the recipient from quickly dismissing the complainant's complaint and if the complainant can provide sufficient evidence, then the commenter asked the Department to require the recipient to open a case and investigate the allegations. A few commenters asked the Department to afford both parties the right to present evidence, not just at the investigation stage, but also during the hearings themselves and during the appeal process. One commenter suggested that the Department should require recipients to consider new evidence at the hearing, including evidence of retaliation or additional harassment by the respondent.

Discussion: A recipient's grievance process must objectively evaluate all relevant evidence (§ 106.45(b)(1)(ii)). Section 106.45(b)(5)(iii) of these final regulations requires the recipients to refrain from restricting the ability of either party to gather and present relevant evidence. Section 106.45(b)(5)(vi) permits both parties equal opportunity to inspect and review all evidence directly related to the allegations. Section 106.45(b)(6)(i)–(ii) directs the decision-maker to allow parties to ask witnesses all relevant questions and follow-up questions, and § 106.45(b)(6)(i) expressly states that only relevant cross-examination questions may be asked at a live hearing. The requirement for recipients to summarize and evaluate relevant evidence, and specification of certain types of evidence that must be deemed not relevant or are otherwise inadmissible in a grievance process pursuant to § 106.45, appropriately directs recipients to focus investigations and adjudications on evidence pertinent to proving whether facts material to the allegations under investigation are more or less likely to be true (i.e., on what is relevant). At the same time, § 106.45 deems certain evidence and information not relevant or otherwise not subject to use in a grievance process: Information protected by a legally recognized privilege;[1149] evidence about a complainant's prior sexual history;[1150] any party's medical, psychological, and similar records unless the party has given voluntary, written consent;[1151] and (as to adjudications by postsecondary institutions), party or witness statements that have not been subjected to cross-examination at a live hearing.[1152]

These final regulations require objective evaluation of relevant evidence, and contain several provisions specifying types of evidence deemed irrelevant or excluded from consideration in a grievance process; a recipient may not adopt evidentiary rules of admissibility that contravene those evidentiary requirements prescribed under § 106.45. For example, a recipient may not adopt a rule excluding relevant evidence whose probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice; although such a rule is part of the Federal Rules of Evidence, the Federal Rules of Evidence constitute a complex, comprehensive set of evidentiary rules and exceptions designed to be applied by judges and lawyers, while Title IX grievance processes are not court trials and are expected to be overseen by layperson officials of a school, college, or university rather than by a judge or lawyer. Similarly, a recipient may not adopt rules excluding certain types of relevant evidence (e.g., lie detector test results, or rape kits) where the type of evidence is not either deemed ''not relevant'' (as is, for instance, evidence concerning a complainant's prior sexual history[1153]) or otherwise barred from use under § 106.45 (as is, for instance, information protected by a legally recognized privilege[1154]). However, the § 106.45 grievance process does not prescribe rules governing how admissible, relevant evidence must be evaluated for weight or credibility by a recipient's decision-maker, and recipients thus have discretion to adopt and apply rules in that regard, so long as such rules do not conflict with § 106.45 and apply equally to both parties.[1155] In response to commenters' concerns that the final regulations do not specify rules about evaluation of evidence, and recognizing that recipients therefore have discretion to adopt rules not otherwise prohibited under § 106.45, the final regulations acknowledge this reality by adding language to the introductory sentence of § 106.45(b): ''Any provisions, rules, or practices other than those required by § 106.45 that a recipient adopts as part of its grievance process for handling formal complaints of sexual harassment, as defined in § 106.30, must apply equally to both parties.'' A recipient may, for example, adopt a rule regarding the weight or credibility (but not the admissibility) that a decision-maker should assign to evidence of a party's prior bad acts, so long as such a rule applied equally to the prior bad acts of complainants and the prior bad acts of respondents. Because a recipient's investigators and decision-makers must be trained specifically with respect to ''issues of relevance,''[1156] any rules adopted by a recipient in this regard should be reflected in the recipient's training materials, which must be publicly available.[1157]

As to a commenter's request that the Department require the recipient to investigate a complaint of sexual harassment or assault if the complainant can supply enough evidence to overcome the recipient's dismissal, the final regulations address mandatory and discretionary dismissals, including expressly giving both parties the right to appeal a recipient's dismissal decision, and one basis of appeal expressly includes where newly discovered evidence may affect the outcome.[1158] Thus, if a recipient dismisses a formal complaint under § 106.45(b)(3)(i) because, for instance, the recipient concludes that the misconduct alleged does not meet the definition of sexual harassment in § 106.30, the complainant can appeal that dismissal, for example by asserting that newly discovered evidence demonstrates that the misconduct in fact does meet the § 106.30 definition of sexual harassment, or alternatively by asserting procedural irregularity on the basis that the alleged conduct in fact does meet the definition of § 106.30 sexual harassment and thus mandatory dismissal was inappropriate under § 106.45(b)(3)(i).

As to commenters' request to allow both parties to introduce new evidence at every stage, including the hearing and on appeal, the final regulations require recipients to allow both parties equally to appeal on certain bases including newly discovered evidence that may affect the outcome of the matter (as well as on the basis of procedural irregularity, or conflict of interest of bias, that may have affected the outcome).[1159] For reasons discussed above, the Department declines to be more prescriptive than the Department believes is necessary to ensure a consistent, fair grievance process, and thus leaves decisions about other circumstances under which a party may offer or present evidence in the recipient's discretion, so long as a recipient's rules in this regard comply with § 106.45(b)(5)(ii) by giving ''equal opportunity'' to both parties to present witnesses (including fact witnesses and expert witnesses) and other evidence (including inculpatory and exculpatory evidence).

Changes: The Department is revising § 106.45(b)(5)(ii) to add the phrase ''including fact and expert witnesses'' to clarify that the equal opportunity to present witnesses must apply to experts. The final regulations also add language to the introductory sentence of § 106.45(b) stating that rules adopted by a recipient for use in the grievance process must apply equally to both parties. We have also added § 106.45(b)(1)(x) prohibiting use of information protected by a legally recognized privilege. We have also revised § 106.45(b)(5)(i) prohibiting use of a party's medical, psychological, and other treatment records without the party's voluntary, written consent.

Section 106.45(b)(5)(iii) Recipients Must Not Restrict Ability of Either Party To Discuss Allegations or Gather and Present Relevant Evidence

Comments: Some commenters expressed support for § 106.45(b)(5)(iii), noting that First Amendment free speech issues are implicated when schools impose ''gag orders'' on parties' ability to speak about a Title IX situation. A few commenters noted that recipients' application of gag orders ends up preventing parties from collecting evidence by preventing them from talking to possible witnesses, and even from calling parents or friends for support.

Many commenters argued that this provision will harm survivors and chill reporting because survivors often feel severe distress when other students know of the survivor's report, or experience stigma and backlash when other students find out the survivor made a formal complaint, which deters reporting.[1160] Other commenters argued that a provision that permits sensitive information to be disseminated and even published on social media or campus newspapers results in loss of privacy and anonymity that betrays already-traumatized survivors. Other commenters opposed this provision fearing it will negatively affect both parties by leading to gossip, shaming, retaliation, and defamation. Other commenters believed this provision opens the door to witness or evidence tampering and intimidation and/or interference with the investigation. Other commenters asserted that the final regulations should permit each party to identify witnesses but then permit only the recipient to discuss the allegations with the witnesses, because witnesses might be more forthcoming with an investigator than with a party.

Some commenters believed that with regard to elementary and secondary schools, the final regulations should clarify the extent to which this provision applies because common sense suggests that a school administrator, such as a principal, should be able to restrict a student from randomly or maliciously discussing allegations of sexual harassment without impeding the student's ability to participate in the formal complaint process.

Several commenters urged the Department to modify this provision in one or more of the following ways: The parties must be permitted to discuss allegations only with those who have a need to know those allegations; the recipient may limit any communication to solely neutral communication specifically intended to gather witnesses and evidence or participate in the grievance process; the recipient may limit the parties' communication or contact with each other during the investigation and prohibit disparaging communications, if those limits apply equally to both parties; recipients must be permitted to restrict the discussion or dissemination of materials marked as confidential; while parties should be allowed to discuss the general nature of the allegations under investigation, recipients should have the authority to limit parties from discussing specific evidence provided under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) with anyone other than their advisor; the evidence discussed should be limited to that which is made accessible to the decision-maker(s), which mirrors the requirements in VAWA; the final regulations should provide an initial warning that neither party is to aggravate the problem in any manner; the final regulations should include language permitting the issuance of ''no contact'' orders as a supportive measure; the final regulations should prohibit parties from engaging in retaliatory conduct in violation of institutional policies.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support for § 106.45(b)(5)(iii). The Department acknowledges the concerns expressed by other commenters concerned about confidentiality and retaliation problems that may arise from application of this provision. This provision contains two related requirements: That a recipient not restrict a party's ability to (i) discuss the allegations under investigation or (ii) gather and present evidence. The two requirements overlap somewhat but serve distinct purposes.

As to this provision's requirement that a recipient not restrict a party's ability to discuss the allegations under investigation, the Department believes that a recipient should not, under the guise of confidentiality concerns, impose prior restraints on students' and employees' ability to discuss (i.e., speak or write about) the allegations under investigation, for example with a parent, friend, or other source of emotional support, or with an advocacy organization. Many commenters have observed that the grievance process is stressful, difficult to navigate, and distressing for both parties, many of whom in the postsecondary institution context are young adults ''on their own'' for the first time, and many of whom in the elementary and secondary school context are minors. The Department does not believe recipients should render parties feeling isolated or alone through the grievance process by restricting parties' ability to seek advice and support outside the recipient's provision of supportive measures. Nor should a party face prior restraint on the party's ability to discuss the allegations under investigation where the party intends to, for example, criticize the recipient's handling of the investigation or approach to Title IX generally. The Department notes that student activism, and employee publication of articles and essays, has spurred many recipients to change or improve Title IX procedures, and often such activism and publications have included discussion by parties to a Title IX grievance process of perceived flaws in the recipient's Title IX policies and procedures. The Department further notes that § 106.45(b)(5)(iii) is not unlimited in scope; by its terms, this provision stops a recipient from restricting parties' ability to discuss ''the allegations under investigation.'' This provision does not, therefore, apply to discussion of information that does not consist of ''the allegations under investigation'' (for example, evidence related to the allegations that has been collected and exchanged between the parties and their advisors during the investigation under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi), or the investigative report summarizing relevant evidence sent to the parties and their advisors under § 106.45(b)(5)(vii)).

As to the requirement in § 106.45(b)(5)(iii) that recipients must not restrict parties' ability ''to gather and present evidence,'' the purpose of this provision is to ensure that parties have equal opportunity to participate in serving their own respective interests in affecting the outcome of the case. This provision helps ensure that other procedural rights under § 106.45 are meaningful to the parties; for example, while the parties have equal opportunity to inspect and review evidence gathered by the recipient under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi), this provision helps make that right meaningful by ensuring that no party's ability to gather evidence (e.g., by contacting a potential witness, or taking photographs of the location where the incident occurred) is hampered by the recipient.

Finally, the two requirements of this provision sometimes overlap, such as where a party's ability to ''discuss the allegations under investigation'' is necessary precisely so that the party can ''gather and present evidence,'' for example to seek advice from an advocacy organization or explain to campus security the need to access a building to inspect the location of an alleged incident.

The Department appreciates the opportunity to clarify that this provision in no way immunizes a party from abusing the right to ''discuss the allegations under investigation'' by, for example, discussing those allegations in a manner that exposes the party to liability for defamation or related privacy torts, or in a manner that constitutes unlawful retaliation. In response to many commenters concerned that the proposed rules did not address retaliation, the final regulations add § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation and stating in relevant part (emphasis added): ''No recipient or other person may intimidate, threaten, coerce, or discriminate against any individual for the purpose of interfering with any right or privilege secured by title IX or this part[.]'' [1161] The Department thus believes that § 106.45(b)(5)(iii)—permitting the parties to discuss the allegations under investigation, and to gather and present evidence—furthers the Department's interest in promoting a fair investigation that gives both parties meaningful opportunity to participate in advancing the party's own interests in case, while abuses of a party's ability to discuss the allegations can be addressed through tort law and retaliation prohibitions.

The Department recognizes commenters' concerns that some discussion about the allegations under investigation may fall short of retaliation or tortious conduct, yet still cause harmful effects. For example, discussion and gossip about the allegations may negatively impact a party's social relationships. For the above reasons, the Department believes that the benefits of § 106.45(b)(5)(iii), for both parties, outweigh the harm that could result from this provision. This provision, by its terms, applies only to discussion of ''the allegations under investigation,'' which means that where a complainant reports sexual harassment but no formal complaint is filed, § 106.45(b)(5)(iii) does not apply, leaving recipients discretion to impose non-disclosure or confidentiality requirements on complainants and respondents. Thus, reporting should not be chilled by this provision because it does not apply to a report of sexual harassment but only where a formal complaint is filed. One reason why the final regulations take great care to preserve a complainant's autonomy to file or not file a formal complaint (yet still receive supportive measures either way) is because participating in a grievance process is a weighty and serious matter, and each complainant should have control over whether or not to undertake that process.[1162] Once allegations are made in a formal complaint, a fair grievance process requires that both parties have every opportunity to fully, meaningfully participate by locating evidence that furthers the party's interests and by confiding in others to receive emotional support and for other personally expressive purposes. The Department believes that this provision, by its plain language, limits the scope of what can be discussed, and laws prohibiting tortious speech and invasion of privacy, and retaliation prohibitions, protect all parties against abusive ''discussion'' otherwise permitted by this provision.

The Department has considered carefully the concerns of several commenters who believe this provision will lead to witness tampering or intimidation, or otherwise interfere with a proper investigation. As to witness intimidation, such conduct is prohibited under § 106.71(a). As to whether a party approaching or speaking to a witness could constitute ''tampering,'' the Department believes that generally, a party's communication with a witness or potential witness must be considered part of a party's right to meaningfully participate in furthering the party's interests in the case, and not an ''interference'' with the investigation. However, where a party's conduct toward a witness might constitute ''tampering'' (for instance, by attempting to alter or prevent a witness's testimony), such conduct also is prohibited under § 106.71(a). Some commenters were particularly concerned that a party's communication with a witness could result in the witness telling a different story to the party than the witness is willing to tell an investigator; any such inconsistencies or discrepancies would be taken into account by the parties, investigator, and decision-maker but do not necessarily constitute ''interference'' with the investigation by the party who spoke with the witness. Furthermore, in some situations, a party may not know the identity of witnesses until discussing the situation with others (for example, asking a roommate who was at the party at which the alleged incident occurred so as to discover whether any party attendees witnessed relevant events); thus, the Department declines to require that only recipients (or their investigators) may communicate with witnesses or potential witnesses.

With respect to commenters concerned about applying this provision in elementary and secondary schools, the Department disagrees that this provision forbids a school principal from warning students not to speak ''maliciously'' since malicious discussion intended to interfere with the other party's Title IX rights would constitute prohibited retaliation.

For the reasons discussed above, the Department declines to narrow or modify this provision per commenters' various suggestions. The Department believes that parties, not recipients, should determine who has a ''need to know'' about the allegations in order to provide advice, support, or assistance to a party during a grievance process; for similar reasons, recipients should not [1161] As discussed in the ''Retaliation'' section of this preamble, § 106.71 takes care to protect the constitutional free speech rights of students and employees at public institutions that must protect constitutional rights. Nonetheless, abuse of speech unprotected by the First Amendment, when such speech amounts to intimidation, threats, or coercion for the purpose of chilling exercise of a person's Title IX rights, is prohibited retaliation.

[1162] As discussed elsewhere in the preamble, including in the ''Formal Complaint'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section, the decision to initiate a grievance process against the wishes of a complainant is one that must be undertaken only when the Title IX Coordinator determines that signing a formal complaint initiating a grievance process against a respondent is not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances.

determine what information to label ''confidential.'' Limiting a party's discussions to ''neutral'' communications, or to communications solely for the purpose of gathering evidence, would deprive the parties of the benefits discussed above, such as seeking emotional support and using the party's experience to express viewpoints on the larger issues of sexual violence or Title IX policies and procedures; for the same reasons the Department declines to narrow this provision to allow discussion only with advisors or to require a warning to parties that neither party should ''aggravate the problem.'' This provision does not affect a recipient's discretion to restrict parties from contact or communication with each other through, e.g., mutual no-contact orders that meet the definition of supportive measures in § 106.30. Where ''disparaging communications'' are unprotected under the Constitution and violate tort laws or constitute retaliation, such communications may be prohibited without violating this provision. This provision applies to discussion of ''the allegations under investigation'' and not to the evidence subject to the parties' inspection and review under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi).

Changes: The final regulations add § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation.

Section 106.45(b)(5)(iv) Advisors of Choice

Supporting Presence and Participation of Advisors

Comments: Some commenters supported allowing parties to have an advisor present because of the severe nature of Title IX charges and the potentially life-altering consequences. Commenters argued the proposed regulations would promote due process and give students more control over the proceedings. Other commenters supported allowing students to have an advisor because it will reduce the risk of false findings by allowing students to avail themselves of an advisor's expertise. Some commenters supported this provision believing the proposed regulations will reconcile Title IX proceedings with protections that are offered in analogous proceedings, such as criminal trials.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the general support from commenters regarding § 106.45(b)(5)(iv), which requires recipients to provide all parties with the same opportunities to have advisors present in Title IX proceedings and to also have advisors participate in Title IX proceedings, subject to equal restrictions on advisors' participation, in recipients' discretion. We share commenters' beliefs that this provision will make the grievance process substantially more thorough and fairer and that the resulting outcomes will be more reliable. The Department recognizes the high stakes for all parties involved in sexual misconduct proceedings under Title IX, and that the outcomes of these cases can carry potentially life-altering consequences, and thus believes every party should have the right to seek advice and assistance from an advisor of the party's choice. However, providing parties the right to select an advisor of choice does not align with the constitutional right of criminal defendants to be provided with effective representation. The more rigorous constitutional protection provided to criminal defendants is not necessary or appropriate in the context of administrative proceedings held by an educational institution rather than by a criminal court. To better clarify that parties' right to an advisor of choice differs from the right to legal representation in a criminal proceeding, the final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(5)(iv) to specify that the advisor of choice may be, but is not required to be, an attorney.

Changes: To clarify that a recipient may not limit the choice or presence of an advisor we have added ''or presence'' to § 106.45(b)(5)(iv), and we have added language in this section to clarify that a party's advisor may be, but is not required to be, an attorney.

Fairness Considerations

Comments: Some commenters argued that § 106.45(b)(5)(iv) is not survivor-centered and will tip the scales in favor of wealthy students who can afford counsel.

Discussion: The Department believes that by permitting both parties to receive guidance from an advisor of their choice throughout the Title IX proceedings, the process will be substantially more thorough and fairer and the resulting outcomes will be more reliable. In response to commenters' concerns, the final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(5)(iv) to specify that a party's chosen advisor may be, but is not required to be, an attorney. The Department acknowledges that a party's choice of advisor may be limited by whether the party can afford to hire an advisor or must rely on an advisor to assist the party without fee or charge. The Department wishes to emphasize that the status of any party's advisor (i.e., whether a party's advisor is an attorney or not), the financial resources of any party, and the potential of any party to yield financial benefits to a recipient, must not affect the recipient's compliance with § 106.45. The Department believes that the clear procedural rights provided to both parties during the grievance process give both parties opportunity to advance each party's respective interests in the case, regardless of financial ability. Further, while the final regulations do not require the recipient to pay for parties' advisors, nothing the in the final regulations precludes a recipient from choosing to do so.

Changes: We have added language in § 106.45(b)(5)(iv) to clarify that a party's advisor may be, but is not required to be, an attorney.

Conflicts of Interest, Confidentiality, and Union Issues

Comments: Commenters argued that student-picked advisors will have a conflict of interest and will raise confidentiality issues. Other commenters expressed concern that § 106.45(b)(5)(iv) may conflict with a union's duty of providing fair representation in the grievance process. One commenter stated that Federal labor law and many State labor laws already provide that an employee subject to investigatory interviews may have a union representative present for a meeting that might lead to discipline.

Discussion: The Department acknowledges the concerns raised by commenters regarding potential conflicts of interest and confidentiality issues arising from permitting the presence or participation of advisors of a party's choice in Title IX proceedings, and potential conflict with labor union duties in grievance processes. With respect to potential conflicts of interest, we believe that parties are in the best position to decide which individuals should serve as their advisors. Advisors, for example, may be friends, family members, attorneys, or other individuals with whom the party has a trusted relationship. The Department believes it would be inappropriate for it to second guess this important decision.

With respect to confidentiality, the Department notes that commenters who raised this issue did not explain exactly how parties' confidentiality interests would be compromised by permitting them to have an advisor of choice to attend or participate in Title IX proceedings. As explained more fully in the ''Section 106.6(e) FERPA'' subsection of the ''Clarifying Amendments to Existing Regulations'' section of this preamble, we note that § 106.6(e) of the final regulations makes it clear that the final regulations should be interpreted to be consistent with a recipient's obligations under FERPA. Recipients may require advisors to use the evidence received for inspection and review under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) as well as the investigative report under § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) only for purposes of the grievance process under § 106.45 and require them not to further disseminate or disclose these materials. Additionally, these final regulations do not prohibit a recipient from using a non-disclosure agreement that complies with these final regulations and other applicable laws.

Lastly, it is not the intent of the Department to undermine the important role that union advisors may play in grievance proceedings. However, we wish to clarify that in the event of an actual conflict between a union contract or practice and the final regulations, then the final regulations would have preemptive effect.[1163] We note that the final regulations do not preclude a union lawyer from serving as an advisor to a party in a proceeding.

Modification Requests

Comments: Some commenters argued that § 106.45(b)(5)(iv) conflicts with past guidance from the Department. Other commenters argued that advisors should not be allowed so students can learn to speak for themselves. Some commenters opposed this provision because they believe there should be no limits on attorney participation in grievance procedures. Some commenters argued that recipients should provide each party with an advisor to assist them throughout the grievance process. Some commenters expressed concern that the presence of advisors could complicate the proceedings, for instance, if the advisor was needed to also serve as a witness, if the advisor did not wish to take part in cross-examinations, if taking part in cross-examinations would adversely affect a teacher-student relationship, or if the advisor had limited availability to attend hearings and meetings. Other commenters suggested there should be no limits placed on who can serve as an advisor and that advisors should be allowed to be fully active participants, especially on behalf of students with disabilities or international students who may need active representation by counsel. Other commenters suggested that advisors should be required to be attorneys in order to avoid unauthorized practice of law.

Discussion: With respect to allowing advisors of choice, who may be attorneys, and the participation of such advisors in grievance procedures, these final regulations take a similar approach to Department guidance, with two significant differences. The withdrawn 2011 Dear Colleague Letter stated that recipients could ''choose'' to allow students to be represented by lawyers during grievance procedures and directed that any rules about a lawyer's appearance or participation must apply equally to both parties.[1164] These final regulations better align the Department's approach to advisors of choice for Title IX purposes with the Clery Act as amended by VAWA,[1165] clarifying that in a Title IX grievance process recipients must allow parties to select advisors of the parties' choice, who may be, but need not be, attorneys, while continuing to insist that any restrictions on the active participation of advisors during the grievance process must apply equally to both parties. Unlike Department guidance or Clery Act regulations, these final regulations implementing Title IX specify that when live hearings are held by postsecondary institutions, the recipient must permit a party's advisor to conduct cross-examination on behalf of a party.[1166] The Department believes that requiring recipients to allow both parties to have an advisor of their own choosing accompany them throughout the Title IX grievance process, and also to participate within limits set by recipients, is important to ensure fairness for all parties. For discussion of the reasons why cross-examination at a live hearing must be conducted by a party's advisor rather than by parties personally, see the ''Hearings'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble. As discussed above, the Department believes that § 106.45(b)(5)(iv) will help to make the grievance process substantially more thorough and fairer, and the resulting outcomes more reliable. While nothing in the final regulations discourages parties from speaking for themselves during the proceedings, the Department believes it is important that each party have the right to receive advice and assistance navigating the grievance process. As such, we decline to forbid parties from obtaining advisors of choice. Section 106.45(b)(5)(iv) (allowing recipients to place restrictions on active participation by party advisors) and the revised introductory sentence to § 106.45(b) (requiring any rules a recipient adopts for its grievance process other than rules required under § 106.45 to apply equally to both parties) would, for example, permit a recipient to require parties personally to answer questions posed by an investigator during an interview, or personally to make any opening or closing statements the recipient allows at a live hearing, so long as such rules apply equally to both parties. We do not believe that specifying what restrictions on advisor participation may be appropriate is necessary, and we decline to remove the discretion of a recipient to restrict an advisor's participation so as not to unnecessarily limit a recipient's flexibility to conduct a grievance process that both complies with § 106.45 and, in the recipient's judgment, best serves the needs and interests of the recipient and its educational community. The Department therefore disagrees that the final regulations should prohibit recipients from imposing any restrictions on the participation of advisors, including attorneys, in the Title IX grievance process.[1167] These final regulations ensure that a party's advisor of choice must be included in the party's receipt of, for instance, evidence subject to party inspection and review,[1168] and the investigative report,[1169] so that a party's advisor of choice is fully informed throughout the investigation in order to advise and assist the party.

The Department understands the concerns of commenters who raised the question of whether acting as a party's advisor of choice could constitute the practice of law such that parties will feel obligated to hire licensed attorneys as advisors of choice, to avoid placing non-attorney advisors (such as a professor, friend, or advocacy organization volunteer) in the untenable position of potentially violating State laws that prohibit the unauthorized practice of law.[1170] While the issues raised by allegations of sexual misconduct may make it preferable or advisable for one or both parties to receive legal advice or obtain legal representation, the Department recognizes school disciplinary proceedings, including the grievance process required under these final regulations, as an administrative setting that does not require either party to be represented by an attorney. The Department believes that the § 106.45 grievance process sets forth clear, transparent procedural rules that enable parties and non-lawyer party advisors effectively to navigate the grievance process. Because the grievance process occurs in an educational setting and does not require court appearances or detailed legal knowledge, the Department believes that assisting a party to a grievance process is best viewed not as practicing law, but rather as providing advocacy services to a complainant or respondent. The Department concludes that with respect to Title IX proceedings the line between assisting a party, and providing legal representation to the party, is a line that has been and will continue to be, an issue taken into consideration by students, recipients, and advocates pursuant to the variety of State unauthorized practice of law statutes.

The Department notes that some commenters argued that the grievance process is complex and frequently intersects with legal proceedings (for example, when a complainant sues the respondent for civil assault or battery, or files a police report that results in a criminal proceeding against the respondent), and that legal representation would benefit both parties to a Title IX proceeding.[1171] The Department leaves recipients flexibility and discretion to determine whether a recipient wishes to provide legal representation to parties in a grievance process, but the final regulations do not restrict the right of each party to select an advisor with whom the party feels most comfortable and believes will best assist the party, and thus clarifies in this provision that the party's advisor of choice may be, but is not required to be, an attorney.

The Department acknowledges commenters' concerns that advisors may also serve as witnesses in Title IX proceedings, or may not wish to conduct cross-examination for a party whom the advisor would otherwise be willing to advise, or may be unavailable to attend all hearings and meetings. Notwithstanding these potential complications that could arise in particular cases, the Department believes it would be inappropriate to restrict the parties' selection of advisors by requiring advisors to be chosen by the recipient, or by precluding a party from selecting an advisor who may also be a witness. The Department notes that the § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) prohibition of Title IX personnel having conflicts of interest or bias does not apply to party advisors (including advisors provided to a party by a postsecondary institution as required under § 106.45(b)(6)(i)), and thus, the existence of a possible conflict of interest where an advisor is assisting one party and also expected to give a statement as a witness does not violate the final regulations. Rather, the perceived ''conflict of interest'' created under that situation would be taken into account by the decision-maker in weighing the credibility and persuasiveness of the advisor-witness's testimony. We further note that live hearings with cross-examination conducted by party advisors is required only for postsecondary institutions, and the requirement for a party's advisor to conduct cross-examination on a party's behalf need not be more extensive than simply relaying the party's desired questions to be asked of other parties and witnesses.[1172]

Changes: We have added language in § 106.45(b)(5)(iv) to clarify that a party's advisor may be, but is not required to be, an attorney.

Section 106.45(b)(5)(v) Written Notice of Hearings, Meetings, and Interviews

Comments: Several commenters supported § 106.45(b)(5)(v) because it will promote fairness, due process, and increase the likelihood of reaching an accurate result. One commenter shared a personal story of a family member with a disability who was not allowed to prepare a defense after being accused of sexual harassment. Other commenters supported this provision believing it offers the same protections that would be offered in a criminal trial. Other commenters supported this provision believing it will limit the abuse of power that can be wielded under Title IX investigations.

Discussion: The Department agrees with commenters who supported this provision on the grounds that it will promote fairness, provides both parties with due process protections, and increase the likelihood of reaching an accurate result. The Department believes that written notice of investigative interviews, meetings, and hearings, with time to prepare, permits both parties meaningfully to advance their respective interests during the grievance process, which helps ensure that relevant evidence is gathered and considered in investigating and adjudicating allegations of sexual harassment.

Changes: None.

Comments: Several commenters argued that the proposed regulations, including § 106.45(b)(5)(v), would be burdensome by requiring recipients to provide written notice, placing them under time constraints, adding administrative layers, and that these burdens would be particularly difficult for elementary and secondary schools.

Discussion: The Department acknowledges the concern of commenters that § 106.45(b)(5)(v) will place a burden on recipients, including elementary and secondary schools, but believes the burden associated with providing this notice is outweighed by the due process protections such notice provides. Because the stakes are high for both parties in a grievance process, both parties should receive notice with sufficient time to prepare before participating in interviews, meetings, or hearings associated with the grievance process, and written notice is better calculated to effectively ensure that parties are apprised of the date, time, and nature of interviews, meetings, and hearings than relying solely on notice in the form of oral communications. For example, if a party receives written notice of the date of an interview, and needs to request rescheduling of the date or time of the interview due to a conflict with the party's class schedule, the recipient and parties benefit from having had the originally-scheduled notice confirmed in writing so that any rescheduled date or time is measured accurately against the original schedule. We note that nothing in these final regulations precludes a recipient from also conveying notice via in-person, telephonic, or other means of conveying the notice, in addition to complying with § 106.45(b)(5)(v) by sending written notice.

Changes: We have made non-substantive revisions to § 106.45(b)(5)(v), such as changing ''the'' to ''a'' in the opening clause ''Provide to a party'' and adding a comma after ''invited or expected,'' for clarity.

Comments: Some commenters argued that the procedures required by the proposed regulations are not suited to the campus environment where proceedings should not be adversarial, where notice of hearings might allow accused students time to destroy evidence and prepare alibis, and where it will contribute to underreporting as complainants will feel a loss of control or bullied because the proposed regulations are not informed by a victim-centered perspective.

Discussion: The Department disagrees that § 106.45(b)(5)(v), or the final regulations overall, increase the adversarial nature of sexual misconduct proceedings or incentivize any party to fabricate or destroy evidence. Allegations of sexual harassment often present an inherently adversarial situation, where parties have different recollections and perspectives about the incident at issue. The final regulations do not increase the adversarial nature of such a situation, but the § 106.45 grievance process (including this provision requiring written notice to both parties with time to prepare to participate in interviews and hearings) helps ensure that the adversarial nature of sexual harassment allegations are investigated and adjudicated impartially by the recipient with meaningful participation by the parties whose interests are adverse to each other.[1173] Accordingly, the final regulations require schools to investigate and adjudicate formal complaints of sexual harassment, and to give complainants and respondents a meaningful opportunity to participate in the investigation that increases the likelihood that the recipient will reach an accurate, reliable determination regarding the respondent's responsibility.

The Department does not agree that providing the parties with advance notice of investigative interviews, meetings, and hearings increases the likelihood that any party will concoct alibis or destroy evidence. The final regulations contain provisions that help ensure that false statements (e.g., making up an alibi) or destruction of evidence will be revealed during the investigation and taken into account in reaching a determination. For example, § 106.45(b)(2) requires the initial written notice to the parties to include a statement about whether the recipient's code of conduct prohibits false statements, and § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) gives both parties equal opportunity to inspect and review all evidence gathered by the recipient that is directly related to the allegations, such that if relevant evidence seems to be missing, a party can point that out to the investigator, and if it turns out that relevant evidence was destroyed by a party, the decision-maker can take that into account in assessing the credibility of parties, and the weight of evidence in the case.

The Department disagrees that § 106.45(b)(5)(v) will contribute to underreporting because complainants will feel a loss of control or bullied, or feel chilled from reporting, or that this provision is not informed by a victim-centered perspective. The Department believes this provision provides a fundamental and essential due process protection that equally benefits complainants and respondents by giving both parties advance notice of interviews, meetings, and hearings so that each party can meaningfully participate and assert their respective positions and viewpoints through the grievance process.[1174] This is an important part of ensuring that the grievance process reaches accurate determinations, which in turn ensures that schools, colleges, and universities know when and how to provide remedies to victims of sex discrimination in the form of sexual harassment.

Changes: None.

Comments: Some commenters suggested that recipients should only be required to give respondents notice of charges, not necessarily of interviews, in order to reflect the standards set by VAWA. Some commenters suggested that the final regulations should require an advisor be copied on all correspondence between the institutions and the parties.

Discussion: The Department disagrees with the commenters who suggested that recipients should only be required to give respondents notice of charges, not necessarily of interviews, in order to reflect the standards set by Section 304 of VAWA. The commenter offered no rationale for why the approach under VAWA is superior to the § 106.45(b)(5)(v) requirements in this regard, and the Department believes that parties are entitled to notice of interviews, meetings, and hearings where the party's participation is expected or invited; otherwise, a party may miss critical opportunities to advance the party's interests during the grievance process. To clarify that this provision intends for notice to be given only to the party whose participation is invited or expected, we have made non-substantive revisions to the language of this provision to better convey that intent. Because this provision is consistent with the VAWA provision cited by commenters, even though this provision requires more notice than the VAWA provision, the Department sees no conflict raised for recipients who must comply with both VAWA and Title IX.

We note that the final regulations do require that copies of the evidence subject to the parties' inspection and review, and a copy of the investigative report, must be sent (electronically or in hard copy) to the parties and to the parties' advisors, if any. The Department appreciates commenters' request that advisors be copied on all correspondence between recipients and the parties, but declines to impose such a rule in order to preserve a recipient's discretion under § 106.45(b)(5)(iv) to limit the participation of party advisors, and to preserve a party's right to decide whether or not, for what purposes, and at what times, the party wishes for an advisor of choice to participate with the party. Nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient from adopting a practice of copying party advisors on all notices sent under § 106.45(b)(5)(v), so long as the recipient complies with the revised introductory sentence of § 106.45(b) by ensuring that such a practice applies equally with respect to both parties.

[1173] E.g., Pennsylvania v. Finley, 481 U.S. 551, 568 (1987) (''The very premise of our adversarial system . . . is that partisan advocacy on both sides of a case will best promote the ultimate objective that the guilty be convicted and the innocent go free.'') (internal quotation marks and citation omitted); see also Tolan v. Cotton, 572 U.S. 650, 660 (2014) (''The witnesses on both sides come to this case with their own perceptions, recollections, and even potential biases. It is in part for that reason that genuine disputes are generally resolved by juries in our adversarial system.'').

Changes: We have revised the language in § 106.45(b)(5)(v) to more clearly convey that notice must be sent to a party when that party's participation is invited or expected with respect to any meeting, interview, or hearing during the grievance process, by changing ''the'' to ''a'' in the clause ''Provide to a party'' in this provision.

Section 106.45(b)(5)(vi) Inspection and Review of Evidence Directly Related to the Allegations, and Directed Question 7

Comments: Many commenters expressed support for § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) and asserted that the proposed regulations seek the equal treatment of complainants and respondents. One commenter asserted that the proposed regulations would remedy sex-biased investigations and included citations to circuit court cases involving male students challenging the Title IX processes at institutions that suspended or expelled the male students for sexual misconduct. A different commenter stated that the proposed regulations would restore fairness and provide full disclosure to both parties so that they can adequately prepare defenses and present additional facts and witnesses. Another commenter concluded that the proposed regulations would ensure justice for complainants and protection for those falsely accused.

A number of commenters shared stories of their personal experiences with recipients withholding information from parties in a Title IX proceeding.

One commenter concluded that both parties having access to all of the evidence will ensure a fair process for both parties. Many commenters remarked that a Title IX investigator should not have unilateral authority to deem certain evidence ''irrelevant.'' Another commenter stated that schools should not hinder evidence reviews with short or limited time windows. One commenter stated that all evidence collected, including evidence collected by law enforcement, should be made available to the respondent.

Some commenters concluded that the electronic view-only format is unreasonable. Other commenters stated that all of the evidence should be provided to the parties to download and review on their own. The commenters remarked that this was necessary, especially in complex cases where review of the evidence would take a significant period of time. Some of these commenters also argued that any effort on the part of a recipient to limit a party's access to the evidence should be viewed as a bad faith effort to negatively impact the proceeding.

While generally supportive of the provision, one commenter argued that the final regulations should require that the investigator incorporate the parties' responses into the final investigative report. Another generally supportive commenter proposed the inclusion of a party's right to call an external investigator. A different commenter supported the adoption of a special master to oversee the adjudicative process.

Some commenters agreed with the ten-day review and comment requirement, determining that it is an appropriate period for allowing the parties to read and provide written responses. Another commenter stated that the exchange of information between the parties will result in expedited hearings.

One supporter of the provision requested that the Department include a provision that would inform the parties of the consequences of submitting false information to the investigator.

A number of commenters opposed § 106.45(b)(5)(vi). One commenter concluded that the proposed regulations, including this provision, were antithetical to the purpose of Title IX. Another commenter called this provision a blunt solution to a nuanced problem that attempts to solve the ''canard'' of false allegations. The commenter added that the Department fails to see the issue through a victim-centered lens, pointing out that the term ''trauma'' is used only once in the NPRM. The same commenter stated that this provision is not informed by best practices for working with trauma survivors.

One commenter argued that the proposed regulations would lead to retaliation and witness tampering. Another commenter stated that § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) would ''revictimize'' complainants. Many commenters stated that this provision will hamstring and compromise investigations, would likely chill the reporting process, is part of the administration's indifference to sexual violence, and will have negative effects on safety and fairness. One commenter concluded that the proposed rules would allow institutions to turn a ''blind eye'' to sexual violence on campus.

One commenter wrote that this provision ''fails to adequately acknowledge the seriousness and complexity of sexual misconduct on college campuses'' and called for a simpler, fairer, and more responsive approach. A different commenter argued that § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) would deter reporting, create difficulties in maintaining student privacy, and make Title IX cases more time-consuming and expensive. According to this commenter, this provision did not account for the potential for reputational damage and that it eliminates key aspects of the discretion that enables institutions to act in the ''best interests of all parties.'' Another commenter concluded that this provision is ''unhelpful and hurtful'' to victims, which, the commenter opined, may be the purpose of the provision.

One commenter stated that the provision allows evidence of past sexual conduct to be presented in an investigation and that such history would be raised to shame complainants.

Another commenter concluded that this provision would result in the respondent being able to coerce new witnesses because the ''regulations allow that.'' The same commenter also stated that the Department's focus on due process is misplaced because there is no due process problem until corrective action is proposed. A different commenter concluded that the provision is a barrier to effective investigation and resolution of Title IX grievances, calling it an ''unacceptable'' and ''untimely'' step. The same commenter proposed eliminating the ten-day period for review of the collected evidence or, conversely, the inclusion of a requirement that each party must have a reasonable opportunity to review the evidence and provide feedback while the investigation is ongoing, but without a set timeline.

One commenter stated that fair notice and an opportunity to respond does not require discovery of all evidence ''directly related'' to the allegations, where the evidence will not be relied upon in making a responsibility determination. Similarly, the commenter argued that requiring recipients to turn over all evidence directly related to the allegations was overbroad and may result, ultimately, in less information being shared by parties during the investigation. Another commenter argued that no rational basis exists for requiring the disclosure of evidence not relied upon in reaching a determination. The commenter added that the provision is extremely confusing and benefits no one.

Many commenters questioned why the Department would allow parties to review evidence upon which the decision-maker does not intend to rely upon in adjudicating the claim. These commenters agreed that only relevant information should be shared with the parties. One of these commenters concluded that the provision ''further legalizes'' the process.

Another commenter argued that, under current judicial precedent, no formal right to discovery exists in a student disciplinary hearing.

One commenter argued in favor of the recipient only sharing information with the parties, allowing them to determine whether the information should be shared with their advisor.

Many commenters supported limitations on the information being shared, including the exclusion or redaction of medical, psychological, financial, sexual history, or other personal and private information that has ''no bearing'' on the investigative report. One commenter argued in favor of permitting schools to release information to the parties based upon the individual circumstances of the case. The commenter stated that this information would unnecessarily violate the privacy of the disclosing parties and would prevent investigators from gathering evidence out of fear that personal information would need to be revealed. The commenter concluded that the result would be ''truly harmful and possibly destructive to anyone who would engage in the formal Title IX process.'' A different commenter concluded that there is no purpose to sharing this information except to intrude into the privacy of the parties. Commenters stated that the final regulations would allow the improper, and potentially widespread, sharing of confidential information and incentivize respondents to ''slip in'' prejudicial information to undermine the process.

A number of commenters concluded that students would be less likely to report sexual harassment and sexual violence if investigations are not conducted properly because there is no incentive for schools to actually investigate. The commenter stated that, if enacted, the proposed rules would harm many students who ''face these problems every day.''

A number of commenters concluded that schools should not be required to disclose irrelevant information and that institutions should be allowed to place ''reasonable restrictions'' on records. Some stated that an exception could be provided for a ''showing of particularized relevance.'' One commenter proposed that schools should not allow access to information they themselves cannot use. Calling the provision ''utterly illogical,'' one commenter stated that sharing irrelevant information would lead to extreme disparity of potential outcomes.

Many commenters opposed the electronic sharing of evidence with the parties. They argued that no system currently exists that limits the user's ability to take pictures of the information on the screen. One commenter was concerned that the proposed regulations do not include a requirement that the viewing of the relevant evidence be supervised and suggested the inclusion of such a provision. Some commenters argued that sharing records electronically could exacerbate gender and socioeconomic inequality and put some students at a disadvantage if they do not have access to a private computer.

A number of commenters proposed sharing the evidence file in hard copy format. Some of these commenters argued in favor of the supervised viewing of evidence files, to protect the party's confidentiality and to prevent parties from taking photographs of the evidence, while others argued for investigators to use their discretion in redacting certain information from the files before sharing with the parties. Some commenters supported redactions for information deemed more prejudicial than probative and for ''inflammatory'' evidence. Many of these commenters expressed concern that the parties should not be allowed to take physical possession of the evidence files. Commenters who favored redactions, also argued that the final regulations unreasonably limit the discretion of investigators. These commenters argued that recipients should have the right to reasonably redact confidential and private information, including the identity of the complainant, if the recipient deems it necessary to do so. One commenter, who favored the hard copy format, argued that students with disabilities may have a difficult time reviewing the files if not submitted in hard copy.

Some commenters remarked that electronic file sharing programs are cost prohibitive, leading some to conclude that such cost would prohibit institutions from paying for advisors for the parties.

Many commenters asserted that the provision could run afoul of State laws, including laws regarding student privacy and the sharing of confidential information, as well as potentially violate State rape shield laws. Some commenters were also concerned about the effect of open-records statutes as a means to publicize investigative files to embarrass the opposing party.

A commenter stated that the proposed regulations fail to state that the report should include all exculpatory and inculpatory evidence, which could prevent an adequate record, jeopardize the parties' ability to make a defense, might diminish the thoroughness with which facts are considered, and unduly raise the risk of bias. Another commenter agreed that crafting a full report before sharing it with the parties is premature and could lead to errors, dissatisfaction, and the appearance of bias.

A number of commenters pointed out that the proposed provision would require recipients to change their current processes, causing a disruption in how they handle Title IX cases on their campuses.

One commenter pointed out that student conduct processes at institutions of higher education are not criminal processes and should not be expected to mirror them. The commenter stated that colleges and universities are not making criminal law decisions, but rather a policy violation determination. In addition, the commenter believed that the best policy would allow students to provide information, respond to information, and ask questions, but in a manner that is appropriate to limit creating an adversarial environment. Similarly, one commenter concluded that the final regulations place a greater burden on recipients than on a criminal prosecutor.

Some commenters opposed enacting a ten-day requirement for review and responses. One commenter suggested that the ten-day timeline was an ''overregulation'' of institutions, suggesting instead that institutions should set their own time frames, so long as they are equitable. A number of commenters argued that institutions should be able to determine appropriate timelines for their own processes. Many commenters questioned whether the Department meant ten calendar days or ten business days. Another commenter suggested shortening the review period from ten to five days. A different commenter stated that the Department should not mandate any time period as, in their opinion, a uniform rule does not fit every circumstance at every school.

One commenter wrote that the final regulation's timeline is more rigid than a similar proceeding in a courtroom, where courts often expedite hearings when time is of the essence.

A commenter asked for clarification as to whether the proposed regulations would require an extra ten days for re-inspection of the supplemented investigative file. The same commenter also asked what, if any, guidelines should be put in place regarding supplementing the record at each stage of the adjudicative process.

One commenter proposed including a non-disclosure agreement as part of the adjudicative process. Another commenter requested that the final regulations should include a provision to punish institutions that have committed ''wrongs'' against respondents in the past.

One commenter requested a regulatory provision that would provide meaningful consequences for violations of confidentiality, including punishment for recipients that do not implement reasonable privacy safeguards or do not permit reasonable redaction policies.

One commenter requested clarification on how long institutions would be required to retain records associated with a Title IX proceeding. Another commenter requested that the Department provide an electronic platform for the storing of data associated with Title IX investigations.

A number of commenters raised issues with the implementation of the final regulations in the K–12 context. Commenters stated that the majority of changes in the proposed rules were not written with a clear understanding of their application to the K–12 environment and that the proposed rules may actually hamper a school district's ability to maintain a safe school environment. For example, the commenter stated that the extension of the timeline (for example, by imposing a ten-day period for review of evidence) impairs a K–12 recipient's ability to effectuate meaningful change to a student's behavior. In addition, the commenter wrote that a ''battle of responses'' will foster more hostility, not less, where there is a high likelihood that the parties will remain within the same school district. The same commenter suggested that the Department should look to provide, and detail, restorative justice options that align with best practices for effective responses to incidents of sexual harassment and sexual violence. One commenter concluded that sharing the evidence file may be appropriate at the postsecondary level, but is inappropriate at the K–12 level. Another commenter called § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) ''overkill'' in the K–12 context. A different commenter supported leaving the issue of evidence review to local school officials. One commenter stated that the ten days to review and respond was unnecessary and would needlessly lengthen K–12 investigations.

Many commenters raised concerns over the burden caused by the proposed regulations on small institutions. Those commenters pointed out that sharing evidence with parties, waiting the required time period, and creating the investigative report and the parties' responses to it is onerous, has limited benefits as a truth-seeking process, and is too burdensome for institutions with only one staff member in charge of all of these responsibilities. Another commenter similarly asserted that small institutions do not currently have staff capacity to comply with § 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii). A different commenter argued that continuous updates to the parties is ''completely impractical'' and ''unduly burdensome'' on the investigator, especially at small colleges.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support of § 106.45(b)(5)(vi). We believe that this provision provides complainants and respondents an equal opportunity to inspect and review evidence and provides transparent disclosure of the universe of relevant and potentially relevant evidence, with sufficient time for both parties to meaningfully prepare arguments based on the evidence that further each party's view of the case, or present additional relevant facts and witnesses that the decision-maker should objectively evaluate before reaching a determination regarding responsibility, including the right to contest the relevance of evidence.

The Department is sensitive to commenters' concerns regarding the parties sharing irrelevant information, as well as relevant information that is relevant but also highly sensitive and personal, as part of the investigative process. This concern, however, must be weighed against the demands of due process and fundamental fairness, which require procedures designed to promote accuracy through meaningful participation of the parties. The Department believes that the right to inspect all evidence directly related to the allegations is an important procedural right for both parties, in order for a respondent to present a defense and for a complainant to present reasons why the respondent should be found responsible. This approach balances the recipient's obligation to impartially gather and objectively evaluate all relevant evidence, including inculpatory and exculpatory evidence, with the parties' equal right to participate in furthering each party's own interests by identifying evidence overlooked by the investigator and evidence the investigator erroneously deemed relevant or irrelevant and making arguments to the decision-maker regarding the relevance of evidence and the weight or credibility of relevant evidence. In response to commenters' suggestions, we have added phrasing in § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) to emphasize that the evidence gathered and sent to the parties for inspection and review is evidence ''directly related to the allegations'' which must specifically include ''inculpatory or exculpatory evidence whether obtained from a party or other source.'' Such inculpatory or exculpatory evidence (related to the allegations) may, therefore, be gathered by the investigator from, for example, law enforcement where a criminal investigation is occurring concurrently with the recipient's Title IX grievance process.

While it may be true in some respects that this provision affords parties greater protection than some courts have determined is required under constitutional due process or concepts of fundamental fairness, that does not necessarily mean that protections such as those contained in § 106.45 are not desirable features of a consistent, transparent grievance process that enhances the fairness and truth-seeking function of the process.[1175] In response to commenters' concerns about disclosure of private medical, psychological, and similar treatment records, these final regulations provide in § 106.45(b)(5)(i) that a recipient cannot access, consider, disclose, or otherwise use a party's records that are made or maintained by a physician, psychiatrist, psychologist, or other recognized professional or paraprofessional acting in the professional's or paraprofessional's capacity, or assisting in that capacity, and which are made and maintained in connection with the provision of treatment to the party, unless the recipient obtains the party's voluntary, written consent to do so for a grievance process under § 106.45. If the party is not an ''eligible student,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3, then the recipient must obtain the voluntary, written consent of a ''parent,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3.[1176] Accordingly, a recipient will not access, consider, disclose, or otherwise use some of the most sensitive documents about a party without the party's (or the parent of the party's) voluntary, written consent, regardless of whether the recipient already has possession of such treatment records, even if the records are relevant. This provision adequately addresses commenter's concerns about sensitive information that may be shared with the other party pursuant to [1175] For further discussion see the ''Role of Due Process in the Grievance Process'' section of this preamble.

[1176] 34 CFR 99.3 is part of regulations implementing FERPA; for further discussion of the intersection between FERPA and these final regulations, see the ''Section 106.6(e) FERPA'' subsection of the ''Clarifying Amendments to Existing Regulations'' section of this preamble.

§ 106.45(b)(5)(vi). Non-treatment records and information, such as a party's financial or sexual history, must be directly related to the allegations at issue in order to be reviewed by the other party under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi), and all evidence summarized in the investigative report under § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) must be ''relevant'' such that evidence about a complainant's sexual predisposition would never be included in the investigative report and evidence about a complainant's prior sexual behavior would only be included if it meets one of the two narrow exceptions stated in § 106.45(b)(6)(i)–(ii) (deeming all questions and evidence about a complainant's sexual predisposition ''not relevant,'' and all questions and evidence about a complainant's prior sexual behavior ''not relevant'' with two limited exceptions).

The Department declines to define certain terms in this provision such as ''upon request,'' ''relevant,'' or ''evidence directly related to the allegations,'' as these terms should be interpreted using their plain and ordinary meaning. We note that ''directly related'' in § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) aligns with requirements in FERPA, 20 U.S.C. 1232g(a)(4)(A)(i).[1177] We also acknowledge that ''directly related'' may sometimes encompass a broader universe of evidence than evidence that is ''relevant.'' However, the § 106.45 grievance process is geared toward reaching reliable, accurate outcomes in a manner that keeps the burden of collecting and evaluating relevant evidence on the recipient while giving both parties equally strong, meaningful opportunities to present, point out, and contribute relevant evidence, so that ultimately the decision-maker objectively evaluates relevant evidence and understands the parties' respective views and arguments about how and why evidence is persuasive or should lead to the outcome desired by the party. The Department therefore believes it is important that at the phase of the investigation where the parties have the opportunity to review and respond to evidence, the universe of that exchanged evidence should include all evidence (inculpatory and exculpatory) that relates to the allegations under investigation, without the investigator having screened out evidence related to the allegations that the investigator does not believe is relevant. The parties should have the opportunity to argue that evidence directly related to the allegations is in fact relevant (and not otherwise barred from use under § 106.45), and parties will not have a robust opportunity to do this if evidence related to the allegations is withheld from the parties by the investigator. For example, an investigator may discover during the investigation that evidence exists in the form of communications between a party and a third party (such as the party's friend or roommate) wherein the party characterizes the incident under investigation. If the investigator decides that such evidence is irrelevant (perhaps from a belief that communications before or after an incident do not make the facts of the incident itself more or less likely to be true), the other party should be entitled to know of the existence of that evidence so as to argue about whether it is relevant. The investigator would then consider the parties' viewpoints about whether such evidence (directly related to the allegations) is also relevant, and on that basis decide whether to summarize that evidence in the investigative report. A party who believes the investigator reached the wrong conclusion about the relevance of the evidence may argue again to the decision-maker (i.e., as part of the party's response to the investigative report, and/or at a live hearing) about whether the evidence is actually relevant, but the parties would not have that opportunity if the evidence had been screened out by the investigator (that is, deemed irrelevant) without the parties having inspected and reviewed it as part of the exchange of evidence under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi).

In response to commenters' concerns that proposed § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) unduly imposed costly or burdensome restrictions by specifying that the evidence sent to the parties must be ''in an electronic format, such as a file sharing platform, that restricts the parties and advisors from downloading or copying the evidence,'' we have removed reference to a file-sharing platform and revised this provision to state that recipients must send the evidence subject to inspection and review to each party, and the party's advisor (if any), in electronic format or hard copy. Under the final regulations, therefore, recipients are neither required nor prohibited from using a file sharing platform that restricts parties and advisors from downloading or copying the evidence. Recipients may require parties and advisors to refrain from disseminating the evidence (for instance, by requiring parties and advisors to sign a non-disclosure agreement that permits review and use of the evidence only for purposes of the Title IX grievance process), thus providing recipients with discretion as to how to provide evidence to the parties that directly relates to the allegations raised in the formal complaint.

With regard to the sharing of confidential information, a recipient may permit or require the investigator to redact information that is not directly related to the allegations (or that is otherwise barred from use under § 106.45, such as information protected by a legally recognized privilege, or a party's treatment records if the party has not given written consent) contained within documents or other evidence that are directly related to the allegations, before sending the evidence to the parties for inspection and review. Further, as noted above, recipients may impose on the parties and party advisors restrictions or require a non-disclosure agreement not to disseminate any of the evidence subject to inspection and review or use such evidence for any purpose unrelated to the Title IX grievance process, as long as doing so does not violate these final regulations or other applicable laws. We reiterate that redacting ''confidential'' information is not the same as redacting information that is not ''directly related to the allegations'' because information that is confidential, sensitive, or private may still be ''directly related to the allegations'' and thus subject to review by both parties. Similarly, a recipient may permit or require the investigator to redact from the investigative report information that is not relevant, which is contained in documents or evidence that is relevant, because § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) requires the investigative report to summarize only ''relevant evidence.''

Section 106.45(b)(5)(vi) is not a ''blunt solution'' as a commenter suggested. The Department recognizes that Title IX enforcement is, in fact, a nuanced problem, and this recognition has informed the policy formation as well as the drafting and revising of this particular provision. We do not believe, as the commenter thinks, that a concern over false allegations is a ''canard,'' nor does the number of times that a particular word is used in the NPRM suggest that the Department is uninterested in, or unmoved by, best practices in the field. We disagree that § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) fails to acknowledge the ''complexity'' of sexual misconduct on college campuses, because this provision is part of a carefully prescribed grievance process that aims to ensure that the parties have meaningful opportunities to participate in advancing each party's interests in these high-stakes cases. The provision proposed in the NPRM, and revised in these final regulations, not only takes into account the complexity of sexual misconduct on college campuses, but considers, as fundamental fairness demands, the experiences and challenges faced by both complainants and respondents.

The Department is sensitive to commenters' concerns over whether the final regulations might deter the reporting of sexual harassment. The § 106.45 grievance process is designed to improve the reliability and legitimacy of recipients' investigations and adjudications of Title IX sexual harassment allegations, and we believe that providing the parties with strong, clear procedural rights improves the fairness and legitimacy of the grievance process. We recognize that a formal grievance process is challenging, difficult, and stressful to navigate, for both complainants and respondents. It is for this reason that these final regulations ensure that parties are not inhibited from seeking support and assistance from any source (see § 106.45(b)(5)(iii)) and that parties have the right to select an advisor of choice to advise and accompany a party throughout the grievance process (see § 106.45(b)(5)(iv)). More broadly, the Department is persuaded by some commenters' concerns that if a complainant is forced to undergo a grievance process whenever a complainant reports sexual harassment, complainants may decide not to report at all, and by other commenters' concerns that without strong, clear procedural rights, recipients' grievance processes will not reach reliable outcomes in which parties and public have confidence. The final regulations therefore increase the obligations on recipients to respond promptly and supportively to every complainant when the recipient receives notice that the complainant has allegedly been victimized by sexual harassment (without requiring any proof or evidence supporting the allegations) irrespective of the existence of a grievance process, promote respect for a complainant's autonomy over whether or not to file a formal complaint that initiates a grievance process, and protect complainants from retaliation for refusing to participate in a grievance process. We have revised § 106.8, § 106.30, and § 106.44 significantly to achieve these aims and have added § 106.71. For example, § 106.8 emphasizes the need for every complainant and all third parties to have clear, accessible options for how to report sexual harassment to the Title IX Coordinator; the definitions of ''complainant'' and ''formal complaint'' in § 106.30 have been revised to clarify that the choice to initiate a grievance process must remain within the control of a complainant unless the Title IX Coordinator has specific reasons justifying the filing of a formal complaint over the wishes of a complainant; § 106.44(a) now requires a recipient to offer supportive measures to a complainant with or without a formal complaint being filed using an interactive process whereby the Title IX Coordinator must discuss and take into account the complainant's wishes regarding the supportive measures to be provided and explain to the complainant the option of filing a formal complaint; and § 106.71 protects the right of any individual to choose not to participate in a grievance process without facing retaliation. The Department intends for these final regulations to assure complainants that complainants may report sexual harassment and receive supportive measures whether or not the complainant also participates in a grievance process, and to assure complainants and respondents that a grievance process will be fair, consistent with constitutional due process, and give both parties meaningful opportunity to advance the party's own interests regarding the case outcome, in an investigation and adjudication overseen by impartial, unbiased Title IX personnel who do not prejudge the facts at issue and objectively evaluate inculpatory and exculpatory evidence before reaching determinations regarding responsibility.

The Department disagrees with commenters' assertions that the final regulations would allow the recipient (or the respondent) to coerce witnesses, turn a ''blind eye'' to sexual violence, or ''revictimize'' complainants. As discussed above, § 106.71 prohibits retaliation (which includes coercion) against any person for participating or refusing to participate in a Title IX proceeding and § 106.44(a) requires recipients to respond to every complainant by offering supportive measures; these requirements ensure that no recipient may turn a blind eye to reported sexual violence. The § 106.45 grievance process, including allowing both parties the opportunity to inspect and review evidence directly related to the allegations, benefits complainants as much as respondents by ensuring that each party is aware of evidence and may then make arguments that further the party's own interests based on the evidence.[1178]

The Department disagrees that due process is not implicated until corrective action is proposed. Due process is not only a concern after corrective or punitive action is taken, but throughout the entire process leading to a recipient's decision to impose corrective or disciplinary action.[1179]

The Department disagrees that § 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii) are a barrier to effective investigations and case resolutions, and believes that to the contrary, these provisions work to guarantee effective investigations and resolutions by allowing the parties full access to the evidence gathered, and to the investigative report that summarizes relevant evidence, so the parties may make corrections, provide appropriate context, and prepare their responses and defenses before a decision-maker reaches a determination regarding responsibility.

We appreciate the commenters who stated that the ten-day time frame provision is appropriate for the parties to review and respond to the evidence directly related to the allegations. We agree that the result of this provision will be expedited hearings because the parties will have had the opportunity to see, review, and consider their responses to evidence prior to showing up at a hearing. However, this provision's purpose is not solely to speed up the process. The Department believes that this provision, in conjunction with the other provisions in § 106.45, balances the need for reasonably prompt resolution of Title IX grievance processes with the need to ensure that these grievance processes are thorough and fair.

The Department understands commenters' concerns that a ten-day time period for the parties to inspect and review evidence (and then a ten-day time period to review and respond to the investigative report) is too long a timeline, but we do not agree that this timeline is an ''overregulation'' or that it is more rigid than a similar proceeding in a criminal court. Instead, the Department finds that the time frame is appropriate for the parties to read and respond to the evidence subject to inspection and review, and then to the investigative report. Recipients may choose whether the ten days should be business days or calendar days (or may use a different calculation of ''days'' that works with the recipient's administrative operations, such as ''school days.'') Although the recipient is required to provide at least ten days for inspection and review, the recipient may give the parties more than ten days to respond, bearing in mind that the recipient must conclude the grievance process within the reasonably prompt time frames to which the recipient must commit under § 106.45(b)(1)(v).

Section 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii) concerning inspection and review of evidence, and review of the investigative report, are not overbroad or likely to lead to information withholding, and do not force the parties to share irrelevant information. These provisions appropriately focus the investigation on evidence ''directly related to the allegations'' and to ''relevant'' evidence in furtherance of each party's interest in permitting pertinent evidence to come to light so that any misunderstandings, confusions, and contradictions can be clarified. As discussed above, the Department has revised § 106.45 to expressly forbid a recipient from using a party's medical, psychological, and similar records without the party's voluntary, written consent, and from using information protected by a legally recognized privilege, and deems ''not relevant'' questions and evidence about a complainant's prior sexual behavior (with two limited exceptions).

We appreciate the commenters' suggestions regarding the inclusion of: A requirement that the viewing of the relevant evidence be supervised; the appointment of a special master; and a provision informing parties of the consequences of submitting false information. Commenters have noted that recipients' restrictions on a party's ability to view the evidence gathered in a case (for example, by requiring the party to sit in a certain room in the recipient's facility, for only a certain length of time, with or without the ability to take notes while reviewing the evidence, and perhaps while supervised by a recipient administrator) have reduced the meaningfulness of the party's opportunity to review evidence and use that review to further the party's interests. We believe it is important for the parties to receive a copy of the evidence subject to inspection and review so that the parties and their advisors may, over the course of a ten-day period, carefully consider the evidence directly related to the allegations, prepare arguments about whether all of that evidence is relevant and whether relevant evidence has been omitted, and consider how the party intends to respond to the evidence. On the other hand, we do not believe that the purposes of the parties' right to inspect and review evidence necessitates or justifies the Department requiring recipient to appoint a ''special master'' to oversee the exchange of evidence. The recipient's investigator will be well-trained in how to conduct an investigation and grievance process and in issues of relevance, under § 106.45(b)(1)(iii). We address warnings about making false statements during a grievance process in § 106.45(b)(2), which requires the written notice of allegations that a recipient sends to both parties upon receipt of a formal complaint to contain a statement about whether the recipient's code of conduct contains a prohibition against making false statements during a grievance process. We do not believe that a further statement about false statements accompanying sending the evidence to the parties under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) serves a necessary purpose and decline to require it.

We decline to change the requirement that recipients send the evidence to a party's advisor (if the party has one).[1180] If a party has exercised the party's right to select an advisor of the party's choice, it is for the purpose of receiving that advisor's assistance during the grievance process, and we do not believe that a party's ten-day window to review and respond to the evidence should be narrowed by placing the burden on the party to receive the evidence from the recipient and then send the evidence to the party's advisor. However, nothing in these final regulations precludes a party from requesting that the recipient not send the evidence subject to inspection and review to the party's advisor. Similarly, the final regulations do not preclude the recipient from asking the parties to confirm whether or not the party has an advisor prior to sending the evidence under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi).

The Department disagrees that sending the evidence, or investigative report, to the parties (and their advisors, if any) will lead to an ''extreme disparity of potential outcomes.'' The provisions in § 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii) are focused on providing precisely the opposite of the commenter's conclusion: Predictable procedural requirements that respondents and complainants can rely upon to afford them a predictable, fair process.

The Department does not agree that § 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii), or the § 106.45 grievance process as a whole, creates the same rights to discovery afforded to civil litigation parties or criminal defendants. For example, parties to a Title IX grievance process are not granted the right to depose parties or witnesses, nor to invoke a court system's subpoena powers to compel parties or witnesses to appear at hearings, which are common features of procedural rules governing litigation and criminal proceedings. Recognizing that schools, colleges, and universities are educational institutions and not courts of law, the Department has prescribed a grievance process that incorporates procedures rooted in principles of due process and fundamental fairness, to give parties clear, meaningful opportunities to participate in influencing the case outcome that advances each party's interests, without imposing on recipients the expectation that recipients should function as de facto courts.

Similarly, the Department does not agree that § 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii) will prolong proceedings, create ancillary disputes, or invade the privacy of parties and witnesses. As various courts have held,[1181] parties are entitled to constitutional due process from public institutions and a fair process from private institutions during Title IX grievance proceedings. In these final regulations, the Department has prescribed a process that provides sufficient due process protections to resolve allegations of sexual harassment in a recipient's education program or activity, in a manner that permits (and requires) a recipient to conclude its grievance process within designated, reasonably prompt time frames, and has taken care to protect party privacy while ensuring that the parties have access to [1180] We have revised § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) to require the investigative report to be sent to the parties and their advisors (if any), for the same reasons that we decline to remove the requirement to send the evidence subject to inspect and review to the parties and their advisors.

information that may affect the outcome of the case.

We appreciate the concerns of many commenters about the burden and costs that § 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii) may impose upon recipients. The Department understands that these provisions have the potential to generate modest burden and costs, but believes that the financial costs and administrative burdens resulting from the provisions are far outweighed by the due process protections ensured by these provisions. We disagree with the assertion that ''sharing evidence with parties'' results in unacceptable burdens on recipients, because reviewing the universe of evidence that is, or may be, relevant represents a critical part of enabling parties to have a meaningful opportunity to be heard, which is an essential component of due process and fundamental fairness. The Department appreciates that many recipients' Title IX offices are inundated and over-worked, but sacrificing procedures important to concepts of due process and fundamental fairness is not an acceptable means of alleviating administrative burdens. We reiterate that where reasonable, we have revised § 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii) to alleviate unnecessary administrative burdens on recipients, for example by removing reference to a file sharing platform and allowing the recipient to send the evidence and investigative report electronically or by hard copy.

The Department also understands that a potentially different set of issues regarding § 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii) may occur where there are multiple formal complaints arising out of a single incident. To expressly authorize recipients to handle cases that arise out of the same incident of sexual harassment involving multiple complainants, multiple respondents, or both, we have added § 106.45(b)(4) to expressly grant discretion to recipients to consolidate formal complaints involving more than one complainant or more than one respondent, where the allegations of sexual harassment arise out of the same facts or circumstances. The Department also provides in § 106.45(b)(4) that where a grievance process involves more than one complainant or more than one respondent, references in § 106.45 to the singular ''party,'' ''complainant,'' or ''respondent'' must include the plural, as applicable. These revisions help clarify that a single grievance process might involve multiple complainants or multiple respondents; we emphasize that in such a situation, each individual party has each right granted to a party under § 106.45 and these final regulations. For example, in a case involving multiple complainants, a recipient would not be permitted to designate one complainant as a ''lead complainant'' and use such a designation to, for instance, only send the evidence to the ''lead complainant'' instead of to each complainant individually.

Parties have the opportunity to provide additional information or context in their written response after reviewing the evidence under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi). The final regulations do not directly address an extension of the timeline for responses, should the parties present additional information after reviewing the evidence. These final regulations provide that the parties must have at least ten days to submit a written response after review and inspection of the evidence directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint. A recipient may require all parties to submit any evidence that they would like the investigator to consider prior to when the parties' time to inspect and review evidence begins. Alternatively, a recipient may choose to allow both parties to provide additional evidence in response to their inspection and review of the evidence under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) and also an opportunity to respond to the other party's additional evidence. Similarly, a recipient has discretion to choose whether to provide a copy of each party's written response to the other party to ensure a fair and transparent process and to allow the parties to adequately prepare for any hearing that is required or provided under the grievance process. A recipient's rules or practices other than those required by § 106.45 that a recipient adopts must apply equally to both parties as required by § 106.45(b). If a recipient chooses not to allow the parties to respond to additional evidence provided by a party in these circumstances, the parties will still receive the investigative report that fairly summarizes relevant evidence under § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) and will receive an opportunity to inspect and review all relevant evidence at any hearing and to refer to such evidence during the hearing, including for purposes of cross-examination at live hearings under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi). If a recipient allows parties to provide additional evidence after reviewing the evidence under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi), any such additional evidence that is summarized in the investigative report will not qualify as new evidence that was reasonably available at the time the determination regarding responsibility was made for purposes of an appeal under § 106.45(b)(8).

The Department agrees with the commenter's concern that the investigative report should contain relevant evidence including exculpatory and inculpatory evidence. Section 106.45(b)(1)(ii) makes clear that the recipient must evaluate relevant evidence including inculpatory and exculpatory evidence. The final regulations add the phrase ''and inculpatory or exculpatory evidence whether obtained from a party or other source'' to § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) with respect to the evidence sent to the parties for inspection and review. Thus, where § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) requires the investigative report to fairly summarize all the relevant evidence, the final regulations make clear that evidence may be relevant whether it is inculpatory or exculpatory.

We do not agree that sharing the investigative report prior to its finalization would lead to errors, dissatisfaction, and the appearance of bias. In fact, those are the very potential problems that sharing the report with the parties seeks to avoid. The parties' responses may address perceived errors that may be corrected, so that the parties have an opportunity to express and note their contentions for or against the investigative report, and sharing the investigative report at the same time, to both parties, helps avoid any appearance of bias.

We appreciate the commenter's questions regarding how the evidence and the investigative report should be shared with the parties. The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) to state that ''the recipient must send to each party and the party's advisor, if any, the evidence subject to inspection and review in an electronic format or a hard copy.'' Similar language is used in § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) regarding sending the parties, and their advisors, copies of the investigative report, electronically or in hard copy format. The Department reminds recipients that these provisions contain baseline requirements, and additional practices to address privacy concerns, such as digital encryption, that do not run afoul of § 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii), or any other provision of the final regulations, are not precluded by these final regulations. The final regulations do not require recipients to provide individual laptops to parties to review the evidence or investigative report, but a recipient may do so at the recipient's discretion, and the option to send parties hard copies under these provisions gives recipients the flexibility to respond to a party's inability to access digital or electronic copies.

The Department does not wish to prohibit the investigator from including recommended findings or conclusions in the investigative report. However, the decision-maker is under an independent obligation to objectively evaluate relevant evidence, and thus cannot simply defer to recommendations made by the investigator in the investigative report. As explained in the ''Section 106.45(b)(7)(i) Single Investigator Model Prohibited'' subsection of the ''Determinations Regarding Responsibility'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble, the decision-maker cannot be the same person as the Title IX Coordinator or the investigator and must issue a written determination regarding responsibility, and one of the purposes of that requirement is to ensure that independent evaluation of the evidence gathered is made prior to reaching the determination regarding responsibility.

The Department appreciates commenters' concerns and requests for clarification regarding the application of the final regulations to the elementary and secondary school environment. We disagree that the grievance process timeline impairs an elementary and secondary school recipient's ability to effectuate meaningful change to a student's behavior. There are many actions a recipient may take with respect to a respondent that constitute permissible supportive measures as defined in § 106.30, which may correct or modify a respondent's behavior without being punitive or disciplinary. Educational conversations with students, for example, and impressing on a student the recipient's anti-sexual harassment policy and code of conduct expectations, need not constitute punitive or disciplinary actions that a school is precluded from taking without following a § 106.45 grievance process. Similarly, we disagree that § 106.45 generally, or § 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii) in particular, foster hostility or hamper a school district's ability to maintain a safe school environment. Providing a predictable, fair grievance process before imposing discipline on students may help reduce hostility and tensions in a school environment, and recipients have many options under the § 106.30 definition of supportive measures for taking action to protect party safety and deter sexual harassment before or during any grievance process and regardless of whether a grievance process is ever initiated. We also remind recipients that § 106.44(c) allows a respondent to be removed from education programs or activities on an emergency basis, without pre-removal notice or hearing, and regardless of whether a grievance process is pending regarding the sexual harassment allegations from which the imminent threat posed by the respondent has arisen.

With regard to records retention, the Department addresses this issue under § 106.45(b)(10). We have revised that provision, including by extending the record retention period from three years as proposed in the NPRM, to seven years under these final regulations.

The Department appreciates the commenter's responses to Directed Question 7. After considering the many public comments responsive to this directed question posed in the NPRM, the Department finds that it would be inappropriate to dilute the requirement that there be a direct relationship between the evidence in question and the allegations under investigation. For reasons discussed above, the final regulations require inspection and review of evidence that is directly related to the allegations, including inculpatory and exculpatory evidence obtained from a party or any other source, and require the investigative report to summarize only relevant evidence.

Changes: The Department makes the following changes to 106.45(b)(5)(vi). First, the phrase ''and inculpatory or exculpatory evidence whether obtained from a party or other source,'' is added. Second, we have added ''or a hard copy'' as an option for sending to the parties and their advisors the evidence subject to inspection and review. Lastly, we have removed the phrase ''such as a file sharing platform, that restricts the parties and advisors from downloading or copying the evidence.''

Section 106.45(b)(5)(vii) An Investigative Report That Fairly Summarizes Relevant Evidence

Comments: Many commenters expressed support for § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) and asserted that the provision would work to restore fairness and due process for complainants and respondents. A number of commenters stated that, in their experience, the ten-day period response period is a reasonable and appropriate time frame. One commenter characterized the NPRM as a long overdue correction to the withdrawn 2011 Dear Colleague Letter, which the commenter called a ''wrongful repudiation'' of due process. The commenter also argued for the Department to adopt a particular recipient's policy as a model for procedures that other recipients should employ in addressing inappropriate sexual activity while simultaneously assuring due process protections.

A number of commenters opposed the provision. Many commenters expressed concern over the mandated ten-day period. Commenters asserted that recipients should determine the appropriate timelines for their process, rather than the Department prescribing this timeline. Similarly, another commenter asserted that ''rigid time frames'' substantially lengthen investigation and adjudication processes. One commenter requested clarification as to why the investigative report must be completed and made available ten days prior to a hearing. The commenter was concerned that such a requirement results in an overly burdensome process with negligible benefits. A different commenter expressed concern that if new information arises during the review of the report, the timeline should be extended to avoid exploitative efforts by either party. One commenter questioned how institutions should respond when a party requests additional time to review the report before the hearing.

One commenter requested clarification over when the parties' written responses to the investigative report are due and what the investigator is supposed to do with the parties' responses.

Some commenters argued that the proposed provision is unnecessary because the parties could address and respond to evidence during a hearing. Many commenters stated that sharing the investigative report is burdensome and could obstruct the investigation. A number of commenters pointed out that the proposed provision would require them to change processes, causing a disruption in how they handle Title IX enforcement on their campus. Citing the addition of significant time and resource requirements to their institution's current procedures, one commenter argued that small institutions lack the capacity right now to comply with this requirement. A different commenter concluded that this provision will impose ''shadow costs'' on institutions.

Another commenter proposed deleting § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) entirely because of concerns over what should be included in the investigative report, the potential for one of the parties to demand a time extension if the report contains a recommendation of responsibility, and the issues raised in multiple complainant proceedings. The same commenter recommended that the investigative report include facts, interview statements from the parties, a preliminary credibility analysis, and the policy applied to the analysis of the alleged behavior. A different commenter suggested that the report only include facts, with no recommended findings or conclusions, stating that summaries can be fraught with ''asymmetrical information delivery'' and may not provide a means for any party to submit corrections. One commenter proposed removing the mandate to share the investigative report with the student's advisor and allowing the student to choose whether they want their advisor to see the report.

One commenter expressed concern that the provision is too vague and leaves many unanswered questions, such as what the final regulations would allow if the parties need to make changes following their review or if additional evidence is located.

A commenter requested a clarification of, or a change to, the language in § 106.45(b)(5)(vi), which refers to ''directly related to the evidence,'' and § 106.45(b)(5)(vii), which refers to ''relevant evidence.''

A commenter stated that, as written, this provision would allow institutions to implement access controls that could limit or deny due process, such as declaring that the report is the property of the institution or creating time limits on viewings. The commenter proposed that the provision should be revised to allow the parties easy access to the report until the final determination is made.

A commenter concluded that provision goes beyond any due process requirement, that they are aware of, to have information in the evidentiary file synthesized into a summary report ten days before the hearing. The commenter also requested clarification as to how the recipient must amend its investigative report in light of the parties' responses.

Many commenters questioned whether the Department meant ten calendar days or ten business days.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support of § 106.45(b)(5)(vii). We agree that the final regulations seek to provide strong, clear procedural protections to complainants and respondents, including apprising both parties of the evidence the investigator has determined to be relevant, in order to adequately prepare for a hearing (if one is required or otherwise provided) and to submit responses about the investigative report for the decision-maker to consider even where a hearing is not required or otherwise provided.

We appreciate the commenter's proposal to follow policies in place at a particular institution. We acknowledge the efforts of particular institutions and have considered policies in place at various individual institutions, but for reasons described in the ''Role of Due Process in the Grievance Process'' section and throughout this preamble, we do not adopt any particular institution's policies or procedures wholesale. We believe that the provisions outlined in these final regulations provide necessary and appropriate due process and fundamental fairness protections to complainants and respondents.

As some commenters have noted, § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) aligns with the practice of many recipients who have become accustomed to conducting investigations in Title IX sexual harassment proceedings and create an investigative report as part of such an investigation. We believe that a standardized provision regarding an investigative report is important in the context of Title IX proceedings even though such a step may not be required in civil litigation or criminal proceedings and even though specific parts of this provision may differ from recipients' current practices (i.e., ensuring that parties are sent a copy of the investigative report ten days prior to the time that a determination regarding responsibility will be made). The Department believes that the purpose of § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) and the specific requirements in this provision are appropriate because a Title IX grievance process occurs in an educational institution (not in a court of law) and because a recipient of Federal funds agrees, under Title IX, to operate education programs or activities free from sex discrimination. It is thus appropriate to obligate the recipient (and not the parties to disputed sexual harassment allegations) to take reasonable steps calculated to ensure that the burden of gathering evidence remains on the recipient, yet to also ensure that the recipient gives the parties meaningful opportunity to understand what evidence the recipient collects and believes is relevant, so the parties can advance their own interests for consideration by the decision-maker. A valuable part of this process is giving the parties (and advisors who are providing assistance and advice to the parties) adequate time to review, assess, and respond to the investigative report in order to fairly prepare for the live hearing or submit arguments to a decision-maker where a hearing is not required or otherwise provided. Without advance knowledge of the investigative report, the parties will be unable to effectively provide context to the evidence included in the report.

While we are sensitive to recipients' concerns regarding burden, cost, and capacity, the Department believes that the required process in § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) does not present onerous demands on recipients. Concerns over burden and capacity should be weighed, not only against fundamental fairness and due process, but in the context of the phase of an investigation when this requirement is in place: During the period when the investigative report should be compiled anyway (that is, after evidence has been gathered and before a determination will be made). In the context of a grievance process that involves multiple complainants, multiple respondents, or both, a recipient may issue a single investigative report. We have added § 106.45(b)(4) to expressly authorize a recipient, in the recipient's discretion, to consolidate formal complaints when allegations all arise out of the same facts or circumstances.

Section 106.45(b)(5)(vii) is important for fairness as well as efficiency purposes; it assures that the investigative report is completed in an expeditious manner, provides the opportunity to the parties to prepare their arguments and defenses, and serves the goal of ensuring constructive, meaningful, and effective hearings (where required, or otherwise provided) and informed determinations regarding responsibility even where the determination is reached without a hearing. Section 106.45(b)(5)(vii) presents no obstacle to an effective investigation and reliable resolution because it comes after an investigation has finished gathering evidence.

The Department shares commenters' concerns about recipient practices that limit access to the investigative report. Practices or rules that limit a party's (or party's advisor's) access to the investigative report violate § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) because under this provision recipients must send a copy of the investigative report electronically or by hard copy to each party and the party's advisor, if any. While this provision does not require a recipient to use a file sharing platform that restricts the parties and advisors from downloading or copying the evidence, recipients may choose to use a file sharing platform that restricts the parties and advisors from downloading or copying the investigative report under § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) and this would constitute sending the parties a copy ''in an electronic format,'' meeting the requirements of this provision.

The Department appreciates commenters' suggestions as to what elements recipients should include in their investigative reports. The Department takes no position here on such elements beyond what is required in these final regulations; namely, that the investigative report must fairly summarize relevant evidence. We note that the decision-maker must prepare a written determination regarding responsibility that must contain certain specific elements (for instance, a description of procedural steps taken during the investigation) [1182] and so a recipient may wish to instruct the investigator to include such matters in the investigative report, but these final regulations do not prescribe the contents of the investigative report other than specifying its core purpose of summarizing relevant evidence.

The Department does not adopt commenters' suggestions to allow institutions to set their own timelines with respect to the parties' window of time to review the investigative report, but the Department has intentionally given recipients flexibility to designate the recipient's own ''reasonably prompt time frames'' for the conclusion of each phase of the grievance process (including appeals and any informal resolution processes) pursuant to § 106.45(b)(1)(v). While we understand from commenters that some recipients may desire to conclude their grievance process in fewer than 20 days (i.e., the two ten-day timelines prescribed in § 106.45 which, in combination, preclude a recipient from designating a time frame for conclusion of an entire grievance process in fewer than 20 days), the Department believes that 20 or fewer days has not been widely viewed as a reasonable time frame for conducting and concluding a truly fair investigation and adjudication of allegations that carry such high stakes for all parties involved. This belief is buttressed by commenters who appreciated that the Department has withdrawn the expectation set forth in the withdrawn 2011 Dear Colleague Letter for recipients to conclude a grievance process within 60 calendar days.[1183] We reiterate that a formal complaint of Title IX sexual harassment alleges serious misconduct that has jeopardized a person's equal educational access, and the determination regarding responsibility carries grave consequences for each party; the purpose of the § 106.45 grievance process is to reduce the likelihood of positive or negative erroneous outcomes (i.e., inaccurate findings of responsibility and inaccurate findings of non-responsibility). Ensuring that each party, in each case, receives effective notice and meaningful opportunity to be heard necessitates some procedures that involve some passage of time (e.g., time for parties and their advisors to review evidence, and to review the investigator's summary of relevant evidence). The § 106.45 grievance process aims to balance the need for a thorough, fair investigation that permits the parties' meaningful participation, with the need to conclude a grievance process promptly to bring resolution to situations that are difficult for both parties to navigate.

We appreciate the commenter's suggestion that the student should get to choose what the student's advisor can see in the investigative report. We do not believe that this issue requires regulation and we do not wish to create unnecessary complexity in the recipient's obligations with respect to sending the investigative report. A party may always request that the recipient not send the investigative report to the party's advisor, but if the party has already indicated that the party has selected an advisor of choice then we believe the better default practice is for the party's advisor to be sent the investigative report, so that the burden of receiving the report, then forwarding it to the party's advisor, does not rest on the party, which would also result in a de facto shortening of the ten-day window in which a party—with assistance from an advisor—may review and prepare responses to the investigator's summary of relevant evidence.

The Department acknowledges the difference between the use of ''directly related to the allegations'' in § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) and ''relevant evidence'' in § 106.45(b)(5)(vii). As discussed above, in the ''Section 106.45(b)(5)(vi) Inspection and Review of Evidence Directly Related to the Allegations, and Directed Question 7'' subsection of the ''Investigation'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble, we acknowledge that ''directly related to the allegations'' may encompass a broader universe of evidence than evidence that is ''relevant,'' and believe that it is most beneficial for the parties' access to evidence to be limited by what is directly related to the allegations, but for the investigator to determine what is relevant after the parties have reviewed that evidence.

Independent of whether this provision would be required to satisfy constitutional due process of law, § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) (giving the parties copies of the investigative report prior to the live hearing or other time of determination) serves an important function in a Title IX grievance process, placing the parties on level footing with regard to accessing information to allow the parties to serve as a check on any decisions that the recipient makes regarding the relevance of evidence and omission of relevant evidence. Allowing the parties to review and respond to the investigative report is important to providing the parties with notice of the evidence the recipient intends to rely on in deciding whether the evidence supports the allegations under investigation. The parties cannot meaningfully respond and put forward their perspectives about the case when they do not know what evidence the investigator considers relevant to the allegations at issue.

These final regulations do not prescribe a process for the inclusion of additional information or for amending or supplementing the investigative report in light of the parties' responses after reviewing the report. However, we are confident that even without explicit regulatory requirements, best practices and respect for fundamental fairness will inform recipients' choices and practices with regard to amending and supplementing the report. Recipients enjoy discretion with respect to whether and how to amend and supplement the investigative report as long as any such rules and practices apply equally to both parties, under the revised introductory sentence of § 106.45(b).

A recipient may give the parties the opportunity to provide additional information or context in their written response to the investigative report, as provided in § 106.45(b)(5)(vii), to remedy any ''asymmetrical information delivery,'' but the Department believes that in combination, § 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii) reduce the likelihood of asymmetrical information delivery because the parties each will have the opportunity to review all the evidence related to the allegations and then all the evidence the investigator decides is relevant. A recipient may require all parties to submit any evidence that they would like the investigator to consider prior to the finalization of the investigative report thereby allowing each party to respond to the evidence in the investigative report sent to the parties under § 106.45(b)(5)(vii). A recipient also may provide both parties with an opportunity to respond to any additional evidence the other party proposes after reviewing the investigative report. If a recipient allows parties to provide additional evidence in response to the investigative report, any such additional evidence will not qualify as new evidence that was reasonably available at the time the determination regarding responsibility was made for purposes of an appeal under § 106.45(b)(8)(i)(B). Similarly, a recipient has discretion to choose whether to provide a copy of each party's written response to the other party as an additional measure to allow the parties to prepare for the hearing (or to be heard prior to the determination regarding responsibility being made, if no hearing is required or provided). As noted above, any rules or practices other than those required by § 106.45 that a recipient adopts must apply equally to both parties, and a recipient must be mindful that rules it chooses to adopt that extend time frames must take into account the recipient's obligation to conclude the entire grievance process within the recipient's own designated time frame, under § 106.45(b)(1)(v).

[1182] Section 106.45(b)(7)(ii).

[1183] 2011 Dear Colleague Letter at 12 (''Based on OCR experience, a typical investigation takes approximately 60 calendar days following receipt of the complaint.''). The Department's experience, therefore, has long been that an adequate investigation into sexual harassment allegations typically takes longer than 20 days.

To conform with the changes we made to § 106.45(b)(5)(vi), we have revised § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) to include a provision that requires the investigative report to be sent to each party and the party's advisor, if any, in an electronic format or a hard copy. As stated elsewhere in this preamble, the final regulations do not require a specific method for calculating ''days.'' Recipients retain flexibility to adopt the method that best works for the recipient's operations, including calculating ''days'' using calendar days, business days, school days, or so forth.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) by changing the parenthetical to refer to ''this section'' instead of ''§ 106.45'' and adding ''or otherwise provided'' after ''if a hearing is required by this section,'' by requiring the investigative report to be sent to parties and their advisors, if any, and by adding the option of sending a copy in electronic format or hard copy.

Hearings

Cross-Examination Generally

Support for Cross-Examination

Comments: Some commenters expressed support for the proposed rules' requirement in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) that postsecondary institutions allow cross-examination at a live hearing because in a college or university setting, where participants are usually adults, cross-examination is an essential pillar of fair process, and where cases turn exclusively or largely on witness testimony as is often the case in peer-on-peer grievances, cross-examination is especially critical to resolve factual disputes between the parties and give each side the opportunity to test the credibility of adverse witnesses, serving the goal of reaching legitimate and fair results.[1184]

Some commenters supported § 106.45(b)(6)(i) because live hearings with cross-examination are consistent with Supreme Court cases interpreting due process of law,[1185] as well as recent case law in which courts have held that cross-examination must be provided in higher education disciplinary proceedings, particularly when credibility is at issue, to meet standards of fundamental fairness and constitutional due process.[1186] Commenters relied on Sixth Circuit cases in particular[1187] to assert that high-stakes cases involving competing narratives require a mutual test of credibility, and to argue that the cost to a university of providing a live hearing with cross-examination is far outweighed by the benefit of reducing the risk of an erroneous finding of responsibility. Some commenters also pointed to a California appellate court decision[1188] where the court found it ironic that an institution of higher learning, where American history and government are taught, should stray so far from the principles that underlie our democracy, and two other California appellate court decisions[1189] that one commenter characterized together as representing unanimous rulings by nine appellate judges that public and private colleges and universities owe basic due process protections to students in Title IX proceedings. Several commenters argued that the recent Sixth Circuit and California appellate decisions illustrate a trend, or growing judicial consensus, that some kind of cross-examination should be permitted in serious student misconduct cases that turn on credibility.[1190] A few commenters argued that under many State APAs (Administrative Procedure Acts) students in serious misconduct cases have a right to cross-examine an accuser and cited cases from Washington and Oregon as examples.[1191]

Commenters opined that requiring a live hearing with cross-examination for postsecondary institutions is perhaps the single most important change in the proposed rules to ensure that determinations are fair. Commenters referred to cross-examination as a ''game-changer'' because currently many college and university processes require parties to submit written questions in advance, to be asked by a school official, which may or may not occur at a live hearing. Commenters asserted that in numerous instances, college and university administrators have refused to ask some or all of a party's submitted questions, reworded a party's questions in ways that undermined the question's effectiveness, ignored follow-up questions, and simply refused to ask ''hard questions'' of parties even when evidence such as text messages appeared to contradict a party's testimony. Commenters argued that written questions are not an effective substitute for live cross-examination because credibility can be determined only when questions are asked in real time in the presence of parties and decision-makers who can listen and observe how a witness answers questions, and when immediate follow-up questions are permitted. Commenters argued that cross-examination is necessary to allow the decision-maker to observe each witness answering questions that can bring out contradictions and improbabilities in the witness's testimony. Commenters cited Supreme Court criminal law cases discussing the symbolic and practical value of cross-examination in the context of the Sixth Amendment's Confrontation Clause.[1192]

Some commenters argued that despite other commenters' assumptions that the proposed rules would allow a complainant to be aggressively or abusively questioned by a respondent's advisor, it is unlikely that campus officials will permit an advisor to question a party in an inappropriate manner; for example, commenters asserted, under current policies most universities only allow lawyers or other advisors to be ''potted plants'' in hearings and school officials enforce that potted-plant policy, demonstrating that recipients are capable of controlling advisors. One commenter asserted that universities, which are dedicated to the free flow of information, will figure out an acceptable way for cross-examination to occur so that campus adjudications can meet generally accepted standards of due process. Several commenters asserted that recipients should, and under the proposed rules would be allowed to, adopt measures to prevent irrelevant, badgering questions and ensure respectful treatment of parties and witnesses. Commenters supported requiring cross-examination to be conducted by party advisors because this will mean that the questioning will be left to professionals, or at least to adults better attuned to the nuances of these cases. Commenters asserted that concerns about aggressive attorneys berating complainants are overblown, because attorneys and even non-attorney advisors know better than to alienate the fact-finder, which is what berating a complainant would do. Commenters asserted that the proposed rules reach a balanced solution by allowing cross-examination to determine credibility while disallowing direct student-to-student questioning and permitting questioning to occur with the parties in separate rooms.

Some commenters supported the cross-examination requirement based on belief that confronting an accuser is a part of the fundamental concept of the rule of law that should apply on college campuses. Some commenters believed that cross-examination will change the ''kangaroo court'' nature of campus Title IX proceedings that lacked basic due process protections, and that asking complainants questions about the allegations does not revictimize a complainant. Several commenters expressed support for cross-examination in the context of belief that the withdrawn 2011 Dear Colleague Letter, and/or the #MeToo movement, have tilted too many colleges and universities to be predisposed to believing young men guilty of sexual assault.

Many commenters supported cross-examination because of personal experiences being accused of a Title IX violation without any opportunity to confront the complainant, asserting that lack of cross-examination allowed a complainant's version of events to go unchallenged.

Many commenters supported cross-examination as an important part of the proposed rules' restoration of due process and fairness that distinguishes the United States from dictatorial regimes where to be accused is the same as being proved guilty. Several commenters argued that cross-examination is vital for finding the truth, which should be the goal of any investigation, because cross-examination reveals a witness's faulty memory or false testimony. Commenters asserted that cross-examination allows the parties to make a searching inquiry to uncover facts that may have been omitted, confused, or overstated.

Some commenters believed that cross-examination will reduce the likelihood of false allegations being made or succeeding. One commenter argued that regardless of whether false allegations happen infrequently or frequently, every case must be considered individually using a proper investigation process with cross-examination. One commenter opposed the proposed rules as problematic and offensive to victims, but supported the cross-examination provision because due process is an inherent right in the United States. This commenter also supported cross-examination because victims going through a criminal trial get cross-examined, and even though false allegations are rare, where there is one, it should be taken care of in accordance with due process.

A few commenters supported the cross-examination requirement because full and fair adversarial procedures are likely to reduce bias in decision making. One commenter quoted Supreme Court criminal law decisions for the proposition that the adversarial ''system is premised on the well-tested principle that truth—as well as fairness—is 'best discovered by powerful statements on both sides of the question.' '' [1193] Another commenter asserted that nothing can completely eliminate sex or racial bias in a system but bias can be reduced by expanding the evidence considered by decision-makers, such as by requiring a full investigation and cross-examination.[1194] One commenter asserted that it is within the Department's jurisdiction to create regulations about cross-examination and other procedures that reduce impermissible implicit bias on the basis of sex stereotypes and unconscious sex-bias.[1195]

A few commenters supported cross-examination because both parties need due process including the right to use cross-examination to establish credibility so that each party has their stated facts scrutinized to find the truth. Some commenters asserted that cross-examination ensures a level of fairness that benefits all parties involved in Title IX cases. A few commenters believed the proposed rules, including the cross-examination requirement, provide a fair and equal opportunity for both sides. One commenter argued that cross-examination holds a great benefit to both parties and allows the investigator and other staff on the case to hear both sides of the story; another commenter stated there are two sides to every issue and both sides must be questioned. One commenter supported the cross-examination requirement and stated that current, unfair procedures harm respondents who are women, and who are gay or lesbian, as well as respondents who are men, giving examples such as a young woman the commenter represented who was so drunk she could not have consented to sex and yet was expelled because the male filed with the Title IX office first. Several commenters asserted that cross-examination is as beneficial for the recipient as for the parties because the decision-maker has the opportunity to observe and judge the credibility of parties and witnesses, thereby serving the recipient's interest in reaching accurate determinations.

Another commenter argued that the opportunity to cross-examine witnesses is a procedural protection that should not be controversial given it is a bedrock principle of the American criminal justice system designed to create a more reliable fact finding process. The commenter believed that a reliable process is in the interest of all parties including recipients, because greater reliability will lead to greater acceptance of the legitimacy of the decisions. This commenter also asserted that institutional opposition to basic notions of due process has led to widespread mistrust of the decision-making processes of Title IX offices, evidenced by the prevalence of Federal lawsuits challenging Title IX decisions made by institutions. The commenter argued that institutions must conform their Title IX procedures to basic notions of due process to establish the legitimacy of their decisions.

One commenter argued that it is unfair to a complainant not to be able to cross-examine a respondent or witnesses. At least one commenter argued that cross-examination will provide greater reliability, which should encourage complainants to report harassment and further support Title IX's objective of protecting the educational environment. One commenter argued that giving respondents a full hearing with cross-examination means that victims of ''contemptible rapists'' can exact justice, and that even if answering questions about painful memories is difficult it is worth it to make sure that rape accusations are not approached lightly. Another commenter asserted that claiming that having an accusation examined is too traumatic for a complainant infantilizes complainants. Several commenters argued that even though testifying about traumatic events is difficult and uncomfortable, testimony from any party that is never questioned cannot be evaluated for truthfulness.

Some commenters supported the proposed rules, and cross-examination as the opportunity to test the credibility of claims, because, commenters asserted, women reject the trampling of constitutional rights in the name of women's rights. One commenter supported live hearings and cross-examination conducted through advisors, including attorneys, because students will have an opportunity to learn about how misconduct allegations are factually examined and determined.

Some commenters supported § 106.45(b)(6)(i) but requested that the provision be expanded to expressly give parties the right to also cross-examine any investigator or preparer of an investigative report, because the entire grievance procedure is often based on the findings in the investigative report and it is thus essential that the parties be able to cross-examine the individuals who prepared the report to probe how conclusions were reached and whether the report is credible.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support for the requirement in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) that postsecondary institutions must hold live hearings with cross-examination conducted by party advisors. The Department agrees with commenters who observed that several appellate courts over the last few years have carefully considered the value of cross-examination in high-stakes student misconduct proceedings in colleges and universities and concluded that part of a meaningful opportunity to be heard includes the ability to challenge the testimony of parties and witnesses. The Department agrees with commenters who noted that this conclusion has been reached by courts both in the context of constitutional due process in public institutions and a fair process in private institutions. The Department agrees with commenters who observed that some States already provide rights to a robust hearing and cross-examination under State APA laws, demonstrating that the notion of live hearings and cross-examination is not new or foreign to many postsecondary institutions. The Department is aware that many postsecondary institutions have created disciplinary systems for sexual misconduct issues that intentionally avoid live hearings and cross-examination, due to concern about retraumatizing sexual assault victims; however, the Department agrees with commenters that in too many instances recipients who have refused to permit parties or their advisors to conduct cross-examination and instead allowed questions to be posed through hearing panels have stifled the value of cross-examination by, for example, refusing to ask relevant questions posed by a party, changing the wording of a party's question, or refusing to allow follow-up questions.

The Department agrees with commenters that cross-examination serves the interests of complainants, respondents, and recipients, by giving the decision-maker the opportunity to observe parties and witnesses answer questions, including those challenging credibility, thus serving the truth-seeking purpose of an adjudication. The Department acknowledges that Title IX grievance processes are not criminal proceedings and thus constitutional protections available to criminal defendants (such as the right to confront one's accuser under the Sixth Amendment) do not apply in the educational context; however, the Department agrees with commenters that cross-examination is a valuable tool for resolving the truth of serious allegations such as those presented in a formal complaint of sexual harassment. The Department emphasizes that cross-examination that may reveal faulty memory, mistaken beliefs, or inaccurate facts about allegations does not mean that the party answering questions is necessarily lying or making intentionally false statements. The Department's belief that cross-examination serves a valuable purpose in resolving factual allegations does not reflect a belief that false accusations occur with any particular frequency in the context of sexual misconduct proceedings. However, the degree to which any inaccuracy, inconsistency, or implausibility in a narrative provided by a party or witness should affect a determination regarding responsibility is a matter to be decided by the decision-maker, after having the opportunity to ask questions of parties and witnesses, and to observe how parties and witnesses answer the questions posed by the other party.

The Department agrees with commenters that the truth-seeking function of cross-examination can be achieved while mitigating any re-traumatization of complainants because under the final regulations: Cross-examination is only conducted by party advisors and not directly or personally by the parties themselves; upon any party's request the entire live hearing, including cross-examination, must occur with the parties in separate rooms; questions about a complainant's prior sexual behavior are barred subject to two limited exceptions; a party's medical or psychological records can only be used with the party's voluntary consent;[1196] recipients are instructed that only relevant questions must be answered and the decision-maker must determine relevance prior to a party or witness answering a cross-examination question; and recipients can oversee cross-examination in a manner that avoids aggressive, abusive questioning of any party or witness.[1197]

The Department agrees with commenters that sex bias is a unique risk in the context of sexual harassment allegations, where the case often turns on plausible, competing factual narratives of an incident involving sexual or sex-based interactions, and application of sex stereotypes and biases may too easily become a part of the decision-making process. The Department agrees with commenters that ensuring fair adversarial procedures lies within the Department's authority to effectuate the purpose of Title IX because such procedures will prevent and reduce sex bias in Title IX grievance processes and better ensure that recipients provide remedies to victims of sexual harassment.

The Department agrees with commenters that cross-examination equally benefits complainants and respondents, and that both parties in a high-stakes proceeding raising contested factual issues deserve equal rights to fully participate in the proceeding. This ensures that the decision-maker observes each party's view, perspective, opinion, belief, and recollection about the incident raised in the formal complaint of sexual harassment. The Department agrees with commenters who note that any person can be a complainant, and any person can be a respondent, regardless of a person's race, sexual orientation, gender identity, or other personal characteristic, and each party, in every case, deserves the opportunity to promote and advocate for the party's unique interests.

The Department agrees with commenters that postsecondary-level adjudications with live hearings and cross-examination will increase the reality and perception by parties and the public that Title IX grievance processes are reaching fair, accurate determinations, and that robust adversarial procedures improve the legitimacy and credibility of a recipient's process, making it more likely that no group of complainants or respondents will experience unfair treatment or unjust outcomes in Title IX proceedings (for example, where formal complaints involve people of color, LGBTQ students, star athletes, renowned faculty, etc.).

The Department agrees with commenters that cross-examination is as powerful a tool for complainants seeking to hold a respondent responsible as it is for a respondent, and that a determination of responsibility reached after a robust hearing benefits victims by removing opportunity for the respondent, the recipient, or the public to doubt the legitimacy of that determination. The Department agrees with commenters that there is no tension between providing strong procedural protections aimed at discovering the truth about allegations in each particular case, and upholding the rights of women (and every person) to participate in education programs or activities free from sex discrimination. The Department appreciates a commenter's belief that observing a live hearing with cross-examination may provide students with opportunity to learn about adjudicatory processes, though the Department notes that the purpose of the § 106.45 grievance process is to reach factually reliable determinations so that sex discrimination in the form of sexual harassment is appropriately remedied by recipients so that no student's educational opportunities are denied due to sex discrimination.

The Department understands commenters' point that often a case is shaped and directed by the evidence gathered and summarized by the investigator in the investigative report, including the investigator's findings, conclusions, and recommendations. The Department emphasizes that the decision-maker must not only be a separate person from any investigator, but the decision-maker is under an obligation to objectively evaluate all relevant evidence both inculpatory and exculpatory, and must therefore independently reach a determination regarding responsibility without giving deference to the investigative report. The Department further notes that § 106.45(b)(6)(i) already contemplates parties' equal right to cross-examine any witness, which could include an investigator, and § 106.45(b)(1)(ii) grants parties equal opportunity to present witnesses including fact and expert witnesses, which may include investigators.

Changes: None.

Retraumatizing Complainants

Comments: Many commenters opposed § 106.45(b)(6)(i) requiring postsecondary institutions to hold live hearings with cross-examination conducted by the parties' advisors. Commenters argued that cross-examination is an adversarial, contentious procedure that will revictimize, retraumatize, and scar survivors of sexual harassment; that cross-examination will exacerbate survivors' PTSD (post-traumatic stress disorder),[1198] RTS (rape trauma syndrome), anxiety, and depression; and cross-examination will interrogate victims like they are the criminals, rub salt in victims' wounds, put rape victims through a second rape, and essentially place the victim on trial when victims are already trying to heal from a horrific experience. Commenters argued that no other form of misconduct gives respondents the right to ''put on trial'' the person accusing the respondent of wrongdoing; one commenter argued that for instance, professors accusing a student of cheating are not ''put on trial,'' a student accusing another student of vandalism is not ''put on trial,'' so singling out sexual misconduct complainants for a procedure designed to intimidate and undermine the complainant's credibility heightens the misperception that the credibility of sexual assault complainants is uniquely suspect. Other commenters acknowledged that some recipients do use cross-examination in non-sexual misconduct hearings because cross-examination can be helpful in getting to the heart of the allegations; these commenters asserted that Title IX hearings are different due to the subject matter and relationships between the parties and cross-examination is inappropriate in sexual misconduct proceedings.

Commenters argued that fear of undergoing such a retraumatizing experience will chill reporting of sexual harassment and cause more victims to stay in the shadows because survivors will have no non-traumatic options in the wake of sexual violence.[1199] Commenters asserted that coming forward is hard enough for victims because often the trauma has resulted in nightmares, intrusive thoughts, inability to concentrate, and hypervigilance, and the prospect of facing grueling, retraumatizing cross-examination will result in even fewer students coming forward.[1200] Commenters argued that reporting will be especially chilled with respect to claims against faculty members, where a power differential already exists.

Commenters believed cross-examination creates secondary victimization, which commenters referred to as a result of interacting with community service providers who engage in victim-blaming attitudes.[1201] Some commenters believed it is cruel to let victims be cross-examined by the person who committed the assault, or to force a victim to be face-to-face with the perpetrator. Some commenters believed that a public hearing where a victim must be cross-examined would be severely traumatizing.

Commenters asserted that anyone taken advantage of by sexual harassment should be able to voice that experience without fear of a traumatizing court case. Commenters argued that subjecting a victim courageous enough to come forward to the re-traumatization of cross-examination is an invasion of the victim's right to privacy and safety. Commenters asserted that as survivors, they have experienced stress, anxiety, nausea, and fear simply from passing by their attackers, and the thought of being cross-examined near their attacker makes these commenters believe they would not be able to speak at all due to fear, would feel permanently traumatized, would drop out of school, or would even contemplate suicide.[1202] Commenters shared personal experiences feeling traumatized by cross-examination in Title IX proceedings, stating that even where a complainant won the case, the experience of cross-examination was so mentally and emotionally taxing that complainants suffered years of mental health treatment, felt unable to perform academically, or dropped out of school.

Some commenters supported reform of school discipline procedures and agreed that complainants and respondents should be treated the same when it comes to procedural rights including a right of cross-examination, but argued that recipients should be allowed discretion to decide whether, or how, to incorporate cross-examination into Title IX grievance processes so long as the decision applies equally to both parties, and that it is intrusive and myopic for the Department to unilaterally impose procedures onto sexual misconduct processes, especially in a way that, in the commenters' views, tilts the system against victims of sexual harassment.

Discussion: The Department believes that cross-examination as required under § 106.45(b)(6)(i) is a necessary part of a fair, truth-seeking grievance process in postsecondary institutions, and that these final regulations apply safeguards that minimize the traumatic effect on complainants. We have revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to clearly state that the entire live hearing (and not only cross-examination) must occur with the parties in separate rooms, at the request of any party; that cross-examination must never be conducted by a party personally; and that only relevant cross-examination questions must be answered and the decision-maker must determine the relevance of a cross-examination question before a party or witness answers. Recipients may adopt rules that govern the conduct and decorum of participants at live hearings so long as such rules comply with these final regulations and apply equally to both parties.[1203] We understand that cross-examination is a difficult and potentially traumatizing experience for any person, perhaps especially a complainant who must answer questions about sexual assault allegations. These final regulations aim to ensure that the truth-seeking value and function of cross-examination applies for the benefit of both parties while minimizing the discomfort or traumatic impact of answering questions about sexual harassment.

While the Department acknowledges that complainants may find a cross-examination procedure emotionally difficult, the Department believes that a complainant can equally benefit from the opportunity to challenge a respondent's consistency, accuracy, memory, and credibility so that the decision-maker can better assess whether a respondent's narrative should be believed. The complainant's advisor will conduct the cross-examination of the respondent and, thus, the complainant will not be retraumatized by having to personally question the respondent. The Department disagrees that cross-examination places a victim (or any party or witness) ''on trial'' or constitutes an interrogation; rather, cross-examination properly conducted simply constitutes a procedure by which each party and witness answers questions posed from a party's unique perspective in an effort to advance the asking party's own interests. The Department disagrees that cross-examination implies that sexual assault complainants are uniquely unreliable; rather, to the extent that cross-examination implies anything about credibility, the Department notes that by giving both parties equal cross-examination rights, the final regulations contemplate that a complainant's allegations, and a respondent's denials, [1203] As revised, the introductory sentence of § 106.45(b) provides: ''Any provisions, rules, or practices other than those required by this section that a recipient adopts as part of its grievance process for handling formal complaints of sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, must apply equally to both parties.'' equally warrant probes for credibility and truthfulness.

The Department appreciates commenters' observations that some recipients do not use live hearings or cross-examination for any form of misconduct charges while other recipients use hearings and cross-examination for some types of misconduct but not for sexual misconduct. The Department does not opine through these final regulations as to whether cross-examination is beneficial for non-sexual harassment misconduct allegations because the Department's focus in these final regulations are the procedures most likely to reach reliable outcomes in the context of Title IX sexual harassment. The Department agrees with commenters who note that sexual harassment allegations present unique circumstances, but disagrees that the subject matter or relationships between parties involved in sexual harassment allegations make cross-examination less useful than for other types of misconduct allegations. Rather, the Department believes that precisely because the subject matter involves sensitive, personal matters presenting high stakes and long-lasting consequences for both parties, robust procedural rights for both parties are all the more important so that each party may fully, meaningfully put forward the party's viewpoints and beliefs about the allegations and the case outcome.

The Department acknowledges that predictions of harsh, aggressive, victim-blaming cross-examination may dissuade complainants from pursuing a formal complaint out of fear of undergoing questioning that could be perceived as an interrogation. However, recipients retain discretion under the final regulations to educate a recipient's community about what cross-examination during a Title IX grievance process will look like, including developing rules and practices (that apply equally to both parties) [1204] to oversee cross-examination to ensure that questioning is relevant, respectful, and non-abusive. We have revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to specifically state that only relevant cross-examination questions must be answered and the decision-maker must determine the relevance of a cross-examination question before the party of witness answers. We have revised § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to specifically require decision-makers to be trained on conducting live hearings and determining relevance (including the non-relevance of questions and evidence about a complainant's prior sexual history). The Department also notes that recipients must comply with obligations under applicable disability laws, and that the final regulations contemplate that disability accommodations (e.g., a short-term postponement of a hearing date due to a party's need to seek medical treatment for anxiety or depression) may be good cause for a limited extension of the recipient's designated, reasonably prompt time frame for the grievance process.[1205]

The Department understands that victims of sexual violence often experience PTSD and other significant negative impacts, and that participating in a grievance process may exacerbate these impacts. The Department believes that the final regulations appropriately provide a framework under which a recipient must offer supportive measures to each complainant (without waiting for a factual adjudication of the complainant's allegations),[1206] and provide remedies for a complainant where the respondent is found responsible following a fair grievance process.[1207] Complainants can receive supportive measures from a recipient, and each complainant can decide whether, in addition to supportive measures, participating in a grievance process is a step the complainant wants to take.[1208] In this manner, these final regulations respect the complainant's autonomy. The Department therefore disagrees with commenters who asserted that under the final regulations complainants will have ''no non-traumatic options'' and will feel deterred from reporting; complainants can report sexual harassment and receive supportive measures without even filing a formal complaint, much less participating in a grievance process or undergoing cross-examination. This option for reporting exists regardless of the identity of the respondent (e.g., whether the respondent is an employee, faculty member, or student), and therefore all complainants have the same non-traumatic reporting option regardless of any real or perceived power differential between the complainant and respondent.

The Department disagrees that including cross-examination as a procedure in the grievance process constitutes institutional betrayal. Cross-examination does not inherently involve victim-blaming attitudes, and as noted above, recipients retain wide discretion under the final regulations to adopt rules and practices designed to ensure that cross-examination occurs in a respectful, non-abusive manner. Further, the reason cross-examination must be conducted by a party's advisor, and not by the decision-maker or other neutral official, is so that the recipient remains truly neutral throughout the grievance process. To the extent that a party wants the other party questioned in an adversarial manner in order to further the asking party's views and interests, that questioning is conducted by the party's own advisor, and not by the recipient. Thus, no complainant (or respondent) need feel as though the recipient is ''taking sides'' or otherwise engaging in cross-examination to make a complainant feel as though the recipient is blaming or disbelieving the complainant.

The Department appreciates the opportunity to clarify that contrary to the fears of some commenters, § 106.45(b)(6)(i) prohibits any complainant from being questioned directly by the respondent; rather, only party advisors can conduct cross-examination. We have revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) specifically to state that cross-examination must occur ''directly, orally, and in real-time'' by the party's advisor and ''never by a party personally.'' Similarly, § 106.45(b)(6)(i) is revised to require recipients to hold the entire live hearing (and not just cross-examination) with the parties in separate rooms (facilitated by technology) so that the parties need never be face-to-face, upon a party's request. Similarly, the Department notes that the live hearing is not a ''public'' hearing, and the final regulations add § 106.71 that requires recipients to keep party and witness identities confidential except as permitted by law and as needed to conduct an investigation or hearing.

The Department understands commenters' concerns that sexual harassment victims have already suffered the underlying conduct and that participating in a grievance process may be difficult for victims. However, before allegations may be treated as fact (i.e., before a complainant can be deemed a victim of particular conduct by a particular respondent), a fair process must reach an accurate outcome, and in situations that involve contested allegations, procedures designed to discover the truth by permitting opposing parties each to advocate for their own viewpoints and interests are most likely to reach accurate outcomes based on facts and evidence rather than assumptions and bias.

The Department disagrees that adjudication via a live hearing with cross-examination invades a complainant's privacy or risks a complainant's safety. The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(5) to ensure that recipients do not access or use any party's treatment records without obtaining the party's written consent, thus limiting the type of sensitive, private information that becomes part of a § 106.45 grievance process without a party's consent. Further, § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) limits the exchange of evidence from an investigation only to evidence directly related to the allegations in the formal complaint. Additionally, § 106.45(b)(6)(i) deems questions and evidence regarding a complainant's prior sexual behavior or sexual predisposition to be irrelevant, with specified exceptions, to further protect complainants' privacy, and upon a party's request the entire live hearing must be held with the parties located in separate rooms. The Department disagrees that an adjudication process that includes a live hearing with cross-examination jeopardizes any party's safety, particularly with the privacy and anti-retaliation provisions referenced above, and the Department further notes that safety-related measures remain available under the final regulations including the ability for a recipient to impose no-contact orders on the parties under § 106.30 defining ''supportive measures,'' or to remove a respondent on an emergency basis under § 106.44(c). Further, a complainant also retains the ability to obtain an order of protection (e.g., a restraining order) from a court of law.

The Department understands commenters' concerns about the prospect of cross-examination, and appreciates commenters' personal experiences with the difficulties of cross-examination, but reiterates that cross-examination essentially consists of questions posed from one party's perspective to advance the asking party's views about the allegations at issue, that recipients retain discretion to control the conduct of cross-examination in a manner that ensures that no party is treated abusively or disrespectfully, that only relevant cross-examination questions must be answered, and that either party may demand that the live hearing occur with the parties in separate rooms. Based on comments from many recipients, the Department believes that recipients desire to treat all their students and employees with dignity and respect, and that recipients will therefore conduct hearings in a manner that keeps the focus on respectful questioning regarding the allegations at issue while permitting each party (through advisors) to advocate for the party's own interests before the decision-maker.

The Department appreciates commenters' support for ensuring that both parties have equal rights with respect to cross-examination, but disagrees that § 106.45(b)(6)(i) is intrusive or myopic because, for reasons explained throughout this preamble, the Department has determined that in the context of resolution of Title IX sexual harassment allegations the procedures in § 106.45 constitute those procedures necessary to ensure consistent, predictable application of Title IX rights, and does not believe that cross-examination in the postsecondary context tilts the system against sexual harassment victims. An equal right of cross-examination benefits complainants as well as respondents, by permitting complainants to participate in advocating for their own view of the case so that a decision-maker is more likely to reach an accurate determination, and where a respondent is found responsible the victim will receive remedies designed to restore or preserve equal access to education.

Changes: We have revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to state that cross-examination must occur ''directly, orally, and in real-time'' by a party's advisor ''and never by a party personally'' and that upon a party's request the entire live hearing (not only cross-examination) must occur with the parties located in separate rooms (with technology enabling participants to see and hear each other). We have further revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to state that only relevant cross-examination questions must be answered, and the decision-maker must determine the relevance of a cross-examination or other question before the party or witness answers the question (and explain any decision to exclude a question as not relevant). The final regulations add § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation and providing in relevant part that the recipient must keep confidential the identity of any individual who has made a report or complaint of sex discrimination, including any individual who has made a report or filed a formal complaint of sexual harassment, any complainant, any individual who has been reported to be the perpetrator of sex discrimination, any respondent, and any witness, except as may be permitted by the FERPA statute or regulations, as required by law, or to carry out the purposes of 34 CFR part 106, including the conduct of any investigation, hearing, or judicial proceeding arising thereunder.

Reducing Truth-Seeking

Comments: Many commenters asserted that cross-examination would mean that complainants are questioned via verbal attacks on the complainant's character rather than sensitively in a respectful manner designed to aid the fact-finding process.[1209] Commenters argued that in criminal cases, it is accepted that the defense counsel's job to put the prosecutor's case in the worst possible light regardless of the truth and to impeach an adverse witness even if the defense attorney believes the witness is telling the truth.[1210]

Commenters argued that cross-examinations are just emotional beatings to twist survivors' perception and memory and lead them to mistakenly admit to or believe in false information, make the survivor feel insecure about what really happened, challenge the legitimacy of the survivor's experience, and therefore lead to an unjust outcome. Commenters argued that cross-examination took the place of torture in our legal system and remains a brutal exercise.[1211] Commenters stated that when working with victims as clients, victims' number one fear is often cross-examination whether in a civil court or criminal court; while they do not fear the truth, they fear defense lawyers' attempts to confuse them and blame them for not remembering every single part of the story even when it was drug or alcohol induced, and they fear telling their story to near strangers and still not getting the justice and safety they need. Commenters argued that cross-examination is designed to engage in DARVO (deny, attack, reverse victim/offender) strategies that harm victims. Commenters argued that even cases that seem to be ''he said/she said'' often involve more evidence than just the parties' statements,[1212] so cross-examination is unnecessary and may disincentivize recipients from conducting a full investigation that uncovers relevant evidence.

Instead, at least in criminal cases, it is accepted that defense counsel's job is ''to put the State's case in the worst possible light, regardless of what he thinks or knows to be the truth'' and to ''cross-examine a prosecution witness, and impeach him if he can, even if he thinks the witness is telling the truth.'' Id. Commenters also cited: Louise Ellison, The Mosaic Art: Cross-Examination and the Vulnerable Witness, 21 Legal Studies 353, 366, 368–369, 373–375 (2001); John Spencer, ''Conclusions,'' in Children and Cross-Examination: Time to Change the Rules? 189 (John Spencer & Michael Lamb eds., Hart Publishing 2012).

Many commenters believed the negative results of cross-examination would be heightened by the proposed rules' requirement that cross-examination be conducted by a party's advisor, who could be a respondent's angry parent, fraternity brother, roommate, or other person untrained in conducting cross-examination and holding severe bias against the complainant. Some commenters asserted that cross-examination by advisors would turn misconduct hearings into unregulated kangaroo courts where untrained, unskilled non-attorney advisors are ''playing attorney'' yet eliciting little or no useful information. Commenters argued that in court trials, the parties themselves feel constrained to come across to judges and juries as nice, earnest, and sympathetic, while attorneys feel free to ''take the gloves off'' when cross-examining the opposing party and the same dynamic would prevail in college disciplinary hearings.

Some commenters asserted that telling complainants that they will be cross-examined by a lawyer or a respondent's parent, roommate, or fraternity brother will make the complainant feel as though the university the complainant should be able to trust is throwing the complainant to proverbial wolves. One commenter recounted being questioned by a respondent's advisor of choice and asserted that the advisor spoke to the commenter in a disempowering, blaming, and condescending way, fueling the commenter's feelings of being traumatized and harming the commenter's ability to function as a student. Some commenters asserted that allowing questioning to take place through an advisor removes accountability students should have for their own actions and will result in students blaming their advisors for poor conduct during a hearing.

Many commenters opposed the cross-examination requirement because the proposed rules do not guarantee procedural protections that accompany cross-examination in criminal or civil trials, such as the right to representation by counsel, rules of evidence,[1213] and a judge ruling on objections. Commenters argued that cross-examination is only potentially useful for discovering the truth when used by skilled lawyers in courtrooms overseen by experienced judges, and that in the hands of untrained, inexperienced advisors will be only a tool to trap, harass, and blame complainants rather than discern truth about allegations.[1214] Commenters asserted that colleges will not adequately protect parties from inappropriate or irrelevant questions, so that cross-examination will intrude into irrelevant details about victims' private lives, reputations, and trustworthiness. Commenters argued that institutions have no power to hold an attorney in contempt, and attorneys are trained to be very aggressive, and thus institutions will not be able to control overly hostile, abusive party advisors who are attorneys. Commenters stated that school administrators are ill equipped to make nuanced legal determinations about the relevant scope of questions and answers, and that schools will be too nervous to act to control lawyers, who will run the show and not respect even the few limits placed on cross-examination.

Commenters asserted that even in court where judges oversee defense attorneys, survivors describe cross-examination as the most distressing part of their experience within the criminal justice system even when the survivors report feeling reasonably able to give accurate evidence.[1215] Commenters asserted that most rape victims face defense lawyer tactics like interrupting, asking for only yes-no answers, asking illogical questions, grilling on minute details of the incident, and asking irrelevant personal questions.[1216] Commenters argued that cross-examination outside a controlled courtroom setting will subject victims to intrusive, retraumatizing questions designed to humiliate, intimidate, and blame them, with no recourse as a victim would have being questioned in front of a judge, thereby weaponizing university proceedings against victims. At least one commenter argued that even in criminal settings, in-person cross-examination is not always required; under some laws vulnerable witnesses such as children are allowed to pre-record evidence in advance rather than testify live.[1217]

All the while, without seeming like a bully, the advocate must humiliate and browbeat the prosecutrix, knowing that if she blows up she will seem less sympathetic, while if she pulls inside herself emotionally she loses credibility as a victim. Discussion: The Department is aware that the perception, and in some circumstances the reality, of cross-examination in sexual assault cases has felt to victims like an emotional beating under which a skilled defense lawyer tries to twist a survivor's words, question the survivor's experience, or convince a fact-finder to find the defense lawyer's client is innocent by blaming the victim for the sexual assault or discrediting the victim with irrelevant character aspersions. The Department reiterates, however, that the essential function of cross-examination is not to embarrass, blame, humiliate, or emotionally berate a party, but rather to ask questions that probe a party's narrative in order to give the decision-maker the fullest view possible of the evidence relevant to the allegations at issue. The Department disagrees with commenters' assertion that cross-examination is the equivalent of torture; while commenters noted Wigmore's observation that cross-examination has taken the place that torture historically occupied in civil law systems (as opposed to our common law system), such an observation implies that cross-examination differs from torture and is the enlightened, humane manner of testing a witness's testimony. The Department purposefully designed these final regulations to allow recipients to retain flexibility to adopt rules of decorum that prohibit any party advisor or decision-maker from questioning witnesses in an abusive, intimidating, or disrespectful manner.

While the Department understands commenters' concerns that cross-examination has in some situations utilized DARVO strategies, cross-examination does not inherently rely on or necessitate DARVO techniques, and recipients retain discretion to apply rules designed to ensure that cross-examination remains focused on relevant topics conducted in a respectful manner. Recipients are in a better position than the Department to craft rules of decorum best suited to their educational environment. To emphasize that cross-examination must focus only on questions that are relevant to the allegations in dispute, we have revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to state that only relevant cross-examination or other questions may be asked of a party or witness, and before a party or witness answers a cross-examination question the decision-maker must determine whether the question is relevant (and explain a decision to exclude a question as not relevant).[1218]

The Department further reiterates that the tool of cross-examination is equally as valuable for complainants as for respondents, because questioning that challenges a respondent's narrative may be as useful for a decision-maker to reach an accurate determination as questioning that challenges a complainant's narrative. The Department agrees with commenters that even so-called ''he said/she said'' cases often involve evidence in addition to the parties' respective narratives, and the § 106.45 grievance process obligates recipients to bear the burden of gathering evidence and to objectively evaluate all relevant evidence, both inculpatory and exculpatory, including the parties' own statements as well as other evidence. The Department disagrees that cross-examination disincentivizes recipients from conducting a full investigation that uncovers all relevant evidence, in part because § 106.45 obligates recipients to gather relevant evidence, and in part because cross-examination occurs at the end of the grievance process such that the parties have already had an opportunity to inspect and review the evidence collected by the recipient.

The Department acknowledges commenters' concerns that under § 106.45(b)(6)(i) cross-examination is conducted by party advisors, and the final regulations do not require a party's advisor of choice to be an attorney, nor may a recipient restrict a party's choice of advisor, resulting in scenarios where a party's advisor may be the party's friend or relative or other person who may not be trained or experienced in conducting cross-examination. Regardless of the identity, status, or profession of a party's advisor of choice, a recipient retains discretion under the final regulations to apply rules at a live hearing that require participants to refrain from engaging in abusive, aggressive behavior. Further, regardless of who serves as a party's advisor, recipients are responsible for ensuring that only relevant cross-examination and other questions are asked, and decision-makers must determine the relevance of each cross-examination question before a party or witness answers. Thus, recipients retain the ability and responsibility to ensure that hearings in a § 106.45 grievance process are in no way ''kangaroo courts'' and instead function as truth-seeking processes.

The Department recognizes that party advisors may be, but are not required to be, attorneys and thus in some proceedings cross-examination on behalf of one or both parties will be conducted by non-lawyers who may be emotionally attached to the party whom they are advising. However, the Department believes that requiring cross-examination to be conducted by party advisors is superior to allowing parties to conduct cross-examination themselves; with respect to complainants and respondents in the context of sexual harassment allegations in an education program or activity, the strictures of the Sixth Amendment do not apply. The Department believes that having advisors as buffers appropriately prevents personal confrontation between the parties while accomplishing the goal of a fair, truth-seeking process. Precisely because a Title IX grievance process is neither a civil nor criminal proceeding in a court of law, the Department clarifies here that conducting cross-examination consists simply of posing questions intended to advance the asking party's perspective with respect to the specific allegations at issue; no legal or other training or expertise can or should be required to ask factual questions in the context of a Title IX grievance process. Thus, the Department disagrees that non-lawyer party advisors will be ''playing attorney.'' The Department notes that a recipient is free to explain to complainants (and respondents) that the recipient is required by these Title IX regulations to provide cross-examination opportunities. The final regulations do not prevent a recipient from adopting rules of decorum for a hearing to ensure respectful questioning, and thus recipients may re-assure parties that the recipient is not throwing a party to the proverbial wolves by conducting a hearing designed to resolve the allegations at issue.

The Department appreciates commenters who described experiences being questioned by party advisors as feeling like the advisor asked questions in a disempowering, blaming, and condescending way; however, the Department notes that such questioning may feel that way to the person being questioned by virtue of the fact that cross-examination is intended to promote the perspective of the opposing party, and this does not necessarily mean that the questioning was irrelevant or abusive. The Department disagrees that allowing questioning to take place through an advisor removes Proposals, Issues and Challenges, Victoria Univ. of Wellington L. Rev. (July 2, 2012) (forthcoming Victoria University of Wellington Legal Research Paper No. 2/2011).

[1218] We have also revised § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to specifically require that decision-makers are trained on issues of relevance, including application of the ''rape shield'' protections in § 106.45(b)(6).

accountability students should have for their own actions. Under the final regulations, the parties themselves retain significant control and responsibility for their own decisions; the role of an advisor is to assist and advise the party. The Department does not agree that the final regulations encourage students to blame their advisors for poor conduct during a hearing; the final regulations do not preclude a recipient from enforcing rules of decorum that ensure all participants, including parties and advisors, participate respectfully and non-abusively during a hearing. If a party's advisor of choice refuses to comply with a recipient's rules of decorum (for example, by insisting on yelling at the other party), the recipient may require the party to use a different advisor. Similarly, if an advisor that the recipient provides refuses to comply with a recipient's rules of decorum, the recipient may provide that party with a different advisor to conduct cross-examination on behalf of that party. This incentivizes a party to work with an advisor of choice in a manner that complies with a recipient's rules that govern the conduct of a hearing, and incentivizes recipients to appoint advisors who also will comply with such rules, so that hearings are conducted with respect for all participants.

The Department understands that cross-examination in a Title IX grievance process is not the same as cross-examination in a civil or criminal court, that a § 106.45 grievance process need not be overseen by a judge, and that party advisors need not be attorneys. However, the Department believes that recipients are equipped to oversee and implement a hearing process focused on the relevant facts at issue, including relevant cross-examination questions, without converting classrooms into courtrooms or necessitating that participants be attorneys or judges. To ensure that recipients understand that the individuals serving as a recipient's decision-maker(s) must understand how to conduct a live hearing and how to address relevance issues, we have revised § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to require decision-makers to receive such training.

The Department agrees with commenters who asserted that postsecondary institutions have already become familiar with the concept of party advisors of choice, that many postsecondary institutions routinely enforce a rule that forbids party advisors from speaking during proceedings (often referred to as a ''potted plant'' rule), and that this practice demonstrates that postsecondary institutions are capable of appropriately controlling party advisors even without the power to hold attorneys in contempt of court. The Department does not believe that determinations about whether certain questions or evidence are relevant or directly related to the allegations at issue requires legal training and that such factual determinations reasonably can be made by layperson recipient officials impartially applying logic and common sense. The Department believes that recipients are capable of, and committed to, controlling a hearing environment to keep the proceeding focused on relevant evidence and ensuring that participants are treated respectfully, such that a recipient's Title IX grievance process will not be ''weaponized'' for or against any party. The Department notes that in criminal proceedings, defendants have a right to self-representation raising the potential for a party to personally conduct cross-examination of witnesses, whereas the final regulations do not grant a right of self-representation and thus avoid the risks of ineffectiveness and trauma for complainants that may arise where a perpetrator personally cross-examines a victim.

The Department acknowledges that even in criminal settings, in-person cross-examination is not always required, and § 106.45(b)(6)(i) has adapted the procedure of cross-examination in a way that avoids importation of criminal law standards, for example by requiring the parties to be in separate rooms (upon either party's request), and disallowing a right of self-representation even if a party would otherwise wish to be self-represented. The Department disagrees, however, that allowing pre-recorded testimony in lieu of answering of questions during a live hearing would sufficiently accomplish the function of cross-examination in the postsecondary context, where the parties' and decision-maker's ability to hear parties' and witness's answers to questions and immediate follow-up questions is the better method of ''airing out'' all viewpoints about the allegations at issue. Pre-recorded testimony does not, for example, allow a party to challenge in real time any inconsistencies and inaccuracies in the other party's testimony by posing follow-up questions.

Demeanor Evaluation Is Unreliable

Comments: Commenters argued that cross-examination is an opportunity to evaluate the body language and demeanor of a party under questioning for the purpose of assessing credibility [1219] but that while credibility is typically based on a number of factors such as sufficient specific detail, inherent plausibility, internal consistency, corroborative evidence, and demeanor, the most unreliable factor is demeanor. Commenters asserted that research shows how people interpret another person's demeanor is easily misconstrued, what people ''read'' in facial expression and body language is ''highly ambiguous and cannot be interpreted without reference to pre-existing schemas and assumptions,'' [1220] a person's ability to judge truthfulness is not better than 50 percent accuracy, and what people often mistake for signs of deception are often actually indicators of stress-coping mechanisms.[1221] Commenters argued that research shows that cross-examination does not accurately assess credibility or yield accurate testimony, especially for vulnerable witnesses such as sexual abuse victims, individuals with intellectual disabilities, or children, and accuracy of children's testimony may be affected by a child's self-esteem, confidence, and the presence of parents during testimony.[1222] Commenters argued that decisions based on observing demeanor could lead to erroneous findings of responsibility when facts do not warrant that outcome, that decision-makers may be more likely to find a respondent responsible after watching an emotional complainant describe an alleged assault, or unfairly view a respondent as not credible just because the respondent seems nervous when the nervousness is due to the serious potential consequences of the hearing. Thus, commenters argued, injecting cross-examination into a Title IX campus adjudication that likely depends on under-trained volunteers to assess credibility, will not improve accuracy of outcomes or increase fairness over the status quo but will make survivors reticent even to report sex discrimination.[1223] Commenters asked what the Department's data-driven basis is for concluding that cross-examination is the most effective procedure for determining truth and credibility. Commenters argued that cross-examination will take an emotional toll on all participants[1224] and that complainants, respondents, and witnesses will all be unwilling to endure it, including because cross-examination could compromise their position in criminal and civil proceedings.

Some commenters argued that cross-examination contemplates a decision-maker observing witnesses to assess credibility based on a witness's demeanor, which increases the danger of racial bias and stereotypes infecting the decision-making process. Commenters argued that Black female students are disadvantaged by cross-examination due to negative, unsupportable stereotypes that Black females are aggressive and sexually promiscuous, and that these students are more likely to be falsely seen as the initiator of sexual harassment or abuse upon cross-examination. Commenters asserted that cross-examination will make male victims scared to report sexual assault perpetrated by a male, for fear of facing a skilled cross-examiner whose aim will be to discredit the male survivor by painting him as an instigator or as having consented to gay sexual activity.

A few commenters argued that cross-examination contradicts the concept of an impartial hearing.

Discussion: The Department agrees with commenters who asserted that cross-examination provides opportunity for a decision-maker to assess credibility based on a number of factors, including evaluation of body language and demeanor, specific details, inherent plausibility, internal consistency, and corroborative evidence. Even if commenters correctly characterize research that casts doubt on the human ability to discern truthfulness by observing body language and demeanor, with respect to determining the credibility of a narrative or statement, as commenters acknowledged, such credibility determinations are not based solely on observing demeanor, but also are based on other factors (e.g., specific details, inherent plausibility, internal consistency, corroborative evidence). Cross-examination brings those important factors to a decision-maker's attention in a way that no other procedural device does; furthermore, while social science research demonstrates the limitations of demeanor as a criterion for judging deception, studies demonstrate that inconsistency is correlated with deception.[1225] Thus, cross-examination remains an important part of truth-seeking in adjudicative proceedings, partly because of the live, in-the-moment nature of the questions and answers, and partly because cross-examination by definition is conducted by someone whose very purpose is to advance one side's perspective. When that happens on behalf of each side, the decision-maker is more likely to see and hear relevant evidence from all viewpoints and have more information with which to reach a determination that better reflects the truth of the allegations.[1226] While commenters contended that some studies cast doubt on the effectiveness of cross-examination in eliciting accurate information, many such studies focus on cross-examination of child victims as opposed to adult victims [1227] and in any event that literature has not persuaded U.S. legal systems to abandon cross-examination, particularly with respect to adults, as the most effective—even if imperfect—tool for pursuing reliable outcomes through exposure of inaccuracy or lack of candor on the part of parties and witnesses.

The Department notes that to the extent that commenters correctly characterize research as indicating that what decision-makers may interpret as signs of deception may in fact be signs of stress, many commenters have pointed out that a grievance process is stressful for both complainants and respondents, and therefore that concern exists for both parties. However, it does not negate the value of cross-examination in bringing to light factors other than demeanor that bear on credibility (such as plausibility and consistency). The final regulations require decision-makers to explain in writing the reasons for determinations regarding responsibility; [1228] if a decision-maker inappropriately applies pre-existing assumptions that amount to bias in the process of evaluating credibility, such bias may provide a basis for a party to appeal.[1229] The Department expects that decision-makers will be well-trained in how to serve impartially, including how to avoid prejudgment of the facts at issue and avoid bias,[1230] and the Department notes that judging credibility is traditionally left in the hands of non-lawyers without specialized training, in the form of jurors who serve as fact-finders in civil and criminal jury trials, because assessing credibility based on factors such as witness demeanor, plausibility, and consistency are functions of common sense rather than legal expertise.

The Department acknowledges that cross-examination may be emotionally difficult for parties and witnesses, especially when the facts at issue concern sensitive, distressing incidents involving sexual conduct. The Department recognizes that not every party or witness will wish to participate, and that recipients have no ability to compel a party or witness to participate. The final regulations protect every individual's right to choose whether to participate by including § 106.71, which expressly forbids retaliating against any person for exercising rights under Title IX including participation or refusal to participate in a Title IX proceeding. Further, § 106.45(b)(6)(i) includes language that directs a decision-maker to reach the determination regarding responsibility based on the evidence remaining even if a party or witness refuses to undergo cross-examination, so that even though the refusing party's statement cannot be considered, the decision-maker may reach a determination based on the remaining evidence so long as no inference is drawn based on the party or witness's absence from the hearing or refusal to answer cross-examination (or other) questions. Thus, even if a party chooses not to appear at the hearing or answer cross-examination questions (whether out of concern about the party's position in a concurrent or potential civil lawsuit or criminal proceeding, or for any other reason), the party's mere absence from the hearing or refusal to answer questions does not affect the determination regarding responsibility in the Title IX grievance process.

The Department acknowledges that in any situation where a complainant has alleged sexual misconduct without the complainant's consent, the possibility exists that the respondent will contend that the sexual conduct was in fact consensual, and that cross-examination in those situations might include questions concerning whether consent was present, resulting in discomfort for complainants in such cases, including for complainants alleging male-on-male sexual violence. However, where a sexual offense turns on the existence of consent and that issue is contested, evidence of consent is relevant and each party's advisor can respectfully ask relevant cross-examination questions about the presence or absence of consent.

The Department disagrees that the cross-examination procedure described in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) contradicts the concept of impartiality of the § 106.45 grievance process. Because these final regulations require each party's advisor, and not the recipient (as the investigator, decision-maker, or other recipient official), to conduct cross-examination, the recipient remains impartial and neutral toward both parties throughout the entirety of the grievance process. By contrast, the parties (through their advisors) are not impartial, are not neutral, and are not objective. Rather, the parties involved in a formal complaint of sexual harassment each have their own viewpoints, beliefs, interests, and desires about the outcome of the grievance process and their participation in the process is for the purpose of furthering their own viewpoints. Cross-examination is conducted by the parties' advisors, who have no obligation to be neutral, while the recipient remains impartial and neutral with respect to both parties by observing the parties' respective advocacy of their own perspectives and interests and reaching a determination regarding responsibility based on objective evaluation of the evidence. Thus, the grievance process remains impartial, even though the parties and their advisors are, by definition, not impartial.

Changes: The final regulations add language to § 106.45(b)(6)(i) stating that if a party or witness does not submit to cross-examination at the hearing, the decision-maker must not rely on any statement of that party or witness in reaching a determination regarding responsibility; provided, however, that the decision-maker cannot draw any inference about the determination regarding responsibility based solely on a party's or witness's absence from the hearing or refusal to answer cross-examination or other questions. The final regulations also add § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation and providing in relevant part that no recipient or other person may intimidate, threaten, coerce, or discriminate against any individual for the purpose of interfering with any right or privilege secured by title IX or part 106 of the Department's regulations, or because the individual has made a report or complaint, testified, assisted, or participated or refused to participate in any manner in an investigation, proceeding, or hearing under this part.

Trauma Responses

Comments: Some commenters argued that cross-examination is inherently unfair for survivors because any adversarial questioning may trigger a trauma response (manifesting as panic attacks, flashbacks, painful memories, dissociation, or even suicidal ideation) and instead survivors must be able to recount their experience in a non-stressful environment where they feel safe, without the stress and pressure of cross-examination that can result in a survivor not being able to give a correct account of what happened or mixing up important facts that can affect the outcome of the case. Commenters argued that trauma shapes memory patterns making details of sexual violence difficult to remember, such that traditional cross-examination may lead to a mistaken conclusion that a trauma victim is lying when in reality the victim is being truthful but is unable to recall or answer questions about events in a detailed, linear, or consistent manner. Commenters argued that cross-examination is designed to point out inconsistencies in a person's testimony often by asking confusing, complex, or leading questions,[1231] and neurobiological effects of trauma affect the brain resulting in fragmented or blocked memories of details of the traumatic event.[1232]

Commenters argued that counterintuitive responses to rape, sexual assault, and other forms of sexual violence are common because trauma impacts the body and brain in ways that impact a person's affect, emotions, behaviors, and memory recall, such that these normal responses to abnormal circumstances can seem perplexing to individuals untrained in sexual violence dynamics and research about the neurobiology of trauma, leading people to unfairly undermine a victim's credibility. Commenters argued that research shows that trauma-informed questioning results in potentially more valuable, reliable information than traditional cross-examination.[1233] Commenters asserted that yelling at someone to recall a specific sequence of events they experienced under traumatic conditions decreases the accuracy of the recall provided.

Commenters asserted that because rape is about power and control, giving a perpetrator more power and control via cross-examination will only intimidate and hurt a victim more.[1234] Commenters argued that while cross-examination is uncomfortable for most people, it can have severe impacts on survivors' mental health [1235] and therefore also on their academic performance. One commenter argued that we would never require our military veterans suffering from PTSD to return from war and sit in a room listening to exploding bombs, so why would we require a rape victim to face interrogation in front of the source of their trauma immediately after the trauma occurred?

Discussion: The Department understands commenters' concerns that survivors of sexual harassment may face trauma-related challenges to answering cross-examination questions about the underlying allegations. The Department is aware that the neurobiology of trauma and the impact of trauma on a survivor's neurobiological functioning is a developing field of study with application to the way in which investigators of sexual violence offenses interact with victims in criminal justice systems and campus sexual misconduct proceedings. Under these final regulations, recipients have discretion to include trauma-informed approaches in the training provided to Title IX Coordinators, investigators, decision-makers, and persons who facilitate informal resolutions so long as the training complies with the requirements of § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) and other requirements in § 106.45, and nothing in the final regulations impedes a recipient's ability to disseminate educational information about trauma to students and employees. As attorneys and consultants with expertise in Title IX grievance proceedings have noted, trauma-informed practices can be implemented as part of an impartial, unbiased system that does not rely on sex stereotypes, but doing so requires taking care not to permit general information about the neurobiology of trauma to lead Title IX personnel to apply generalizations to allegations in specific cases.[1236] Because cross-examination occurs only after the recipient has conducted a thorough investigation, trauma-informed questioning can occur by a recipient's investigator giving the parties opportunity to make statements under trauma-informed approaches prior to being cross-examined by the opposing party's advisor.

With respect to cross-examination, the Department notes that the final regulations do not prevent a recipient from granting breaks during a live hearing to permit a party to recover from a panic attack or flashback, nor do the final regulations require answers to cross-examinations to be in linear or sequential formats. The final regulations do not require that any party, including a complainant, must recall details with certain levels of specificity; rather, a party's answers to cross-examination questions can and should be evaluated by a decision-maker in context, including taking into account that a party may experience stress while trying to answer questions. Because decision-makers must be trained to serve impartially without prejudging the facts at issue, the final regulations protect against a party being unfairly judged due to inability to recount each specific detail of an incident in sequence, whether such inability is due to trauma, the effects of drugs or alcohol, or simple fallibility of human memory. We have also revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) in a manner that builds in a ''pause'' to the cross-examination process; before a party or witness answers a cross-examination question, the decision-maker must determine if the question is relevant. This helps ensure that content of cross-examination remains focused only on relevant questions and that the pace of cross-examination does not place undue pressure on a party or witness to answer immediately.

The Department reiterates that recipients retain the discretion to control the live hearing environment to ensure that no party is ''yelled'' at or asked questions in an abusive or intimidating manner. The Department further reiterates that cross-examination is as valuable a tool for complainants to challenge a respondent's version of events as it is for a respondent to challenge a complainant's narrative. Because cross-examination is conducted only through party advisors, we believe that the cross-examination procedure helps to equalize power and control, because both parties have equal opportunity to ask questions that advocate the party's own perspectives and beliefs about the underlying incident regardless of any power, control, or authority differential that exists between the parties.

The Department agrees that cross-examination is likely an uncomfortable experience for most people, including complainants and respondents; numerous commenters have informed the Department that navigating a grievance process as a complainant or as a respondent has caused individuals to feel stressed, have difficulty focusing on academic performance, and feel anxious and depressed. The final regulations offer both parties protection against feeling forced to participate in a grievance process and equal procedural protections when an individual does participate. To that end, the final regulations require recipients to offer complainants supportive measures regardless of whether a formal complaint is filed [1237] (and encourage supportive measures for respondents as well),[1238] and where a party does participate in a grievance process the party has the right to an advisor of choice.[1239] Additionally, the final regulations add § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation and specifically protecting an individual's right to participate or not participate in a grievance process.

The Department appreciates a commenter's analogy to a military veteran experiencing PTSD; however, the we believe that § 106.45(b)(6)(i) anticipates the potential for re-traumatization of sexual assault victims and mitigates such an effect by ensuring that a complainant (or respondent) can request being in separate rooms for the entire live hearing (including during cross-examination) so that the parties never have to face each other in person, by leaving recipients flexibility to design rules (applied equally to both parties) that ensure that no party is questioned in an abusive or intimidating manner, and by requiring the decision-maker to determine the relevance of each cross-examination question before a party or witness answers. Further, the Department notes that there is no statute of limitations setting a time frame for filing a formal complaint,[1240] and that completing the investigation under § 106.45 requires a reasonable amount of time (for example, the parties must be given an initial written notice of the allegations, the recipient must gather evidence, give the parties ten days to review the evidence, prepare an investigative report, and give the parties ten days to review the investigative report),[1241] and therefore it is unlikely that a complainant would ever be required to ''immediately'' undergo cross-examination following a sexual assault covered by Title IX.

Changes: None.

Reliance on Rape Myths

Comments: Many commenters cited an article [1242] by Sarah Zydervelt et al., (herein, ''Zydervelt 2016'') describing cross-examination of rape victims as often involving detailed, personal, humiliating questions rooted in sex stereotypes and rape myths that tend to blame victims for incidents of sexual violence.[1243] Commenters argued that because cross-examination relies on rape myths, requiring cross-examination contradicts § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) which forbids training materials for Title IX personnel from relying on sex stereotypes.

Commenters argued that the Department's insistence on cross-examination for rape victims when victims of non-sexual crimes do not have to undergo cross-examination demonstrates ''rape exceptionalism,'' an unfounded notion that sexual assault and rape are different kinds of cases because rape victims lie more than victims of other crimes.[1244]

Discussion: The study cited most often by commenters for the proposition that cross-examination relies on questions rooted in sex stereotypes and rape myths, Zydervelt 2016, is a research study in which the authors compared strategies and tactics employed by defense attorneys in criminal trials in Australia and New Zealand during two time periods (from 1950–1959, and from 1996–2011) to analyze whether the strategies and tactics differed in those time periods (the earlier time period representing pre-legal reforms in the area of rape law, and the later time period representing contemporary legal reforms such as defining rape to include marital rape, eliminating the requirement of corroborating evidence and the requirement that the victim showed physical resistance to the sexual attack, and imposing rape shield protections limiting questions about a victim's sexual history and sexual behavior).[1245] Zydervelt 2016 identified four strategies employed by defense attorneys to challenge a rape victim's testimony:

[1237] Section 106.44(a).

[1238] Section 106.30 (defining ''supportive measures'' and expressly indicating that such individualized services may be provided to complainants or respondents); § 106.45(b)(1)(ix) (requiring a recipient's grievance process to describe the range of supportive measures available to complainants and to respondents).

[1239] Section 106.45(b)(5)(iv).

[1240] Section 106.30 (defining ''formal complaint'' and providing that a complainant must be ''participating or attempting to participate'' in the recipient's education program or activity at the time of filing a formal complaint). Even a complainant who has graduated may, for instance, be ''attempting to participate'' in the recipient's education program or activity by, for example, desiring to apply to a graduate program with the recipient, or desiring to remain involved alumni events and organizations.

[1243] Many commenters cited to information regarding negative impacts of sexual harassment and harmful effects of institutional betrayal, such as the data noted in the ''Impact Data'' and ''Commonly Cited Sources'' subsections of the ''General Support and Opposition'' section of this preamble, in support of arguments that cross-examination will further reduce rates of reporting.

Questions designed to challenge plausibility, consistency, credibility, and reliability. Zydervelt 2016 further identified tactics used to further each of those four strategies;[1246] for example, the most common strategy identified in the study was challenging plausibility, and the most common tactic used in that strategy involved questions about the complainant's behavior immediately before or after the alleged attack.[1247]

Zydervelt 2016 defined ''rape myths'' as ''beliefs about rape that serve to deny, downplay or justify sexually aggressive behavior that men commit against women'' which ''can be descriptive, reflecting how people believe instances of sexual assault typically unfold, or they can be prescriptive, reflecting beliefs about how a victim of sexual assault should react'' and further identified common rape myths as ''the belief that victims invite sexual assault by the way that they dress, their consumption of alcohol, their sexual history or their association with males with whom they are not in a relationship; the belief that many women make false allegations of rape; the belief that genuine assault would be reported to authorities immediately; and the belief that victims would fight back—and therefore sustain injury or damage to clothing—during an assault.'' [1248] Zydervelt 2016 concluded that historically and contemporarily, defense attorneys employ similar strategies and tactics when cross-examining rape victims in criminal trials, and that rape victims still report cross-examination as a distressing and demeaning experience.[1249] Zydervelt 2016 concluded that leveraging rape myths was a common tactic when cross-examining rape victims,[1250] for example, asking questions suggesting that willingly accompanying a defendant alone to a room implied consent to a sexual act, or that a ''real'' victim would not have returned to a party with a defendant if they had just been sexually assaulted.

The authors of Zydervelt 2016 opined in conclusion that the extent to which misconceptions about rape shape cross-examination questions in rape cases likely reflects the extent to which society adheres to particular beliefs about rape.[1251] The study's authors also noted that more research is required to assist policy makers to make informed decisions about how best to address these issues,[1252] and further surmised that because the strategies and tactics used in cross-examination during rape cases remained similar over time, investigators, prosecutors, and advocates could preemptively assist rape victims who need to testify by better preparing the victim to anticipate the kinds of questions that commonly arise during rape cross-examinations.[1253]

The Department understands commenters' concerns that Zydervelt 2016 indicates that misconceptions about rape and sexual assault victims permeate cross-examination strategies and tactics in the criminal justice system. However, this study indicates that to the extent that misconceptions or negative stereotypes about sexual assault affect cross-examination in rape cases, the problem lies with societal beliefs about sexual assault and not with cross-examination as a tool for resolving competing narratives in sexual assault cases. The final regulations require recipients to ensure that decision-makers are well-trained in conducting a grievance process and serving impartially, using materials that avoid sex stereotypes, and specifically on issues of relevance including application of the rape shield protections in § 106.45(b)(6). Further, as noted above, nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient from including in that training information about the impact of trauma on victims or other aspects of sexual violence dynamics, so long as any such training promotes impartiality and avoidance of prejudgment of the facts at issue, bias, conflicts of interest, and sex stereotypes. Thus, unlike a civil or criminal court system, where jurors who act as fact-finders are not trained, the § 106.45 grievance process requires recipients to use decision-makers who have been trained to avoid bias and sex stereotypes and to focus proceedings on relevant questions and evidence, such that even if a cross-examination question impermissibly relies on bias or sex stereotypes while attempting to challenge a party's plausibility, credibility, reliability, or consistency, it is the trained decision-maker, and not the party advisor asking a question, who determines whether the question is relevant and if it is relevant, then evaluates the question and any resulting testimony in order to reach a determination regarding responsibility. For the same reasons, the Department disagrees that cross-examination violates or contradicts § 106.45(b)(1)(iii), which forbids training materials for Title IX personnel from relying on sex stereotypes; the latter provision serves precisely to ensure that decision-makers do not allow sex stereotypes to influence the decision-maker's determination regarding responsibility.

The Department disagrees that the § 106.45 grievance process, including cross-examination at live hearings in postsecondary institutions, reflects adherence to rape exceptionalism or any belief that women (or complainants generally) tend to lie about rape more than other offenses. The Department believes that cross-examination as a tool for testing competing narratives serves an important truth-seeking function in a variety of types of misconduct allegations; these final regulations focus on the procedures designed to prescribe a consistent framework for recipients' handling of formal complaints of sexual harassment so that a determination is likely to be accurate in each particular case, regardless of how infrequently false allegations are made. The Department reiterates that cross-examination provides complainants with the same opportunity through an advisor to question and expose inconsistencies in the respondent's testimony and to reveal any ulterior motives. In this manner, cross-examination levels the playing field by giving a complainant as much procedural control as a respondent, regardless of the fact that exertion of

For the strategy of challenging plausibility, the study identified the following tactics used by defense attorneys during cross-examination questions: Defendant's good character; lack of injury or clothing damage; complainant's behavior immediately before and after offense; lack of resistance; delayed report; continued relationship. For the strategy of challenging credibility, the study identified the following tactics used by defense attorneys during cross-examination questions: Prior relationship with the defendant; sexual history; personal traits; previous sexual assault complaint; ulterior motive. For the strategy of challenging reliability, the study identified the following tactics used by defense attorneys during cross-examination questions: Alcohol/drug intoxication; barriers to perception; memory fallibility. For the strategy of challenging consistency, the study identified the following tactics used by defense attorneys during cross-examination questions: Inconsistency with complainant's own account, with defendant's account, with another witness's account, and with physical evidence.

Cross-Examination as a Due Process Requirement

Comments: Commenters argued that cross-examination is not necessary because neither the Constitution, nor other Federal law, requires cross-examination in school conduct proceedings.[1254] Commenters characterized recent Sixth Circuit cases, holding that cross-examination must be provided, as anomalous rather than indicative of a judicial trend favoring live cross-examination in college disciplinary proceedings.[1255] Commenters asserted that the Department's cross-examination requirement does not contain the limitations that the Sixth Circuit delineated in Baum; namely, that cross-examination is required only for public colleges, in situations where credibility is in dispute and material to the outcome, where potential sanctions are suspension or expulsion, and where the burden on the university is minimal because the university already holds hearings for some types of misconduct.

Commenters argued that Federal case law shows a split in how courts view cross-examination in college disciplinary proceedings with the weight of Federal case law favoring significant limits on cross-examination by requiring, at most, questioning through a panel or submission of written questions rather than traditional, adversarial cross-examination, for both public and private institutions.[1256] Commenters argued that colleges and universities should not be required to ignore judicial precedent simply because the Department currently finds a recent two-to-one decision from the Sixth Circuit (i.e., Baum) more persuasive than the many other Federal court decisions that do not require live cross-examination as part of constitutional due process or fundamental fairness, and that principles of federalism, administrative law, and general rule of law demand that the Department refrain from overreaching by imposing this requirement.

Several commenters argued that regardless of how cross-examination is viewed under a constitutional right to due process, private colleges and universities owe contractual obligations to their students and employees, not constitutional ones, and requiring live hearings and cross-examination marks a substantial governmental intrusion into the relationship between private institutions and their students. Several commenters asserted that private institutions should remain free to craft their own adjudication rules so long as such rules are fair and equitable.

Commenters argued that unless lawmakers specifically direct universities to grant cross-examination rights, or the right to counsel, in civil or administrative hearings,[1257] such elevated procedures cannot be expected of universities.

Commenters argued that cross-examination by skilled defense counsel is the most aggressive means of testing a witness's credibility and, by requiring this, the proposed rules seem based on a premise that a complainant's credibility is highly suspect. Commenters asserted that because a university Title IX grievance process is neither a civil lawsuit (where a plaintiff seeks money damages against the defendant) or a criminal trial (where a criminal defendant faces loss of liberty), the highest degree of credibility-testing is neither necessary nor reasonable. Commenters argued that State laws restricting Sixth Amendment rights to confront accusers can be constitutionally permissible due to policy concerns for protecting sexual assault victims from suffering further psychological harms,[1258] and thus similar or greater restrictions can be part of a noncriminal proceeding like a Title IX process.

Commenters argued that fairness, including testing credibility, can be fully achieved without live, adversarial cross-examination, through questioning by a neutral college administrator,[1259] referred to by some commenters as ''indirect cross-examination.'' Commenters similarly argued that allowing parties to submit questions to be asked by a hearing officer or panel is sufficiently reliable without causing trauma to any involved party,[1260] a practice commenters asserted should be adopted from the withdrawn 2011 Dear Colleague Letter. Commenters asserted that this method allows the parties and decision-maker to hear parties and witnesses answer questions in ''real time'' but without the adversarial purpose and tone of cross-examination.

Commenters asserted a similar version of this practice, used by Harvard Law School and endorsed by the American Bar Association Criminal Justice Section, and by the University of California Post SB 169 Working Group, should be called ''submitted questions'' instead of ''cross-examination'' and would invite both parties to submit questions to the presiding decision-maker who must then ask all the questions unless the questions are irrelevant, excluded by a rule clearly adopted in advance, harassing, or duplicative.

Commenters argued that indirect cross-examination, or submitted questions, is sufficient to meet constitutional due process requirements under the Supreme Court's Mathews v. Eldridge balancing test [1261] and avoids risks inherent to cross-examination in an educational rather than courtroom setting, namely, that outside a courtroom lawyers or other advisors could engage in hurtful, harmful techniques that may impede educational access for the parties. Commenters argued that a trained fact-finder listening to party advisors ask questions and introduce evidence is a reactionary approach and a proactive approach is preferable, whereby the trained decision-maker elicits appropriate, relevant information from the parties and witnesses. Commenters argued that most postsecondary institutions currently use a trauma-informed method of questioning such as indirect cross-examination or submitted questions,[1262] and that such practices have been upheld by nearly all Federal court decisions considering them.

Commenters argued that because credibility is determined by the decision-maker, and not by parties or witnesses, there should be no right for parties to directly question the other party or witnesses. Commenters stated that if the Department's assumption that live cross-examination is better than submission of questions through a neutral hearing officer rests on concern that the hearing officer might unfairly refuse to ask a party's questions, the proposed rules address that concern by requiring the decision-maker to explain the reasons for exclusion of any questions, so live cross-examination is not a necessity on that basis. One commenter argued that although cross-examination may be the greatest legal engine ever invented for discovery of truth, engines come in different shapes and sizes for a reason, and the effective, appropriate version of the engine of cross-examination in the Title IX context is questioning by neutral hearing officers.

Some commenters proposed that the decision-maker act as a liaison between the parties, such that each party's advisor would ask a question one at a time, live and in full hearing of the other party, and the decision-maker would then decide whether the other party should or should not answer the question; commenters asserted that this version of live cross-examination would better filter out abusive, irrelevant questions while preserving the opportunity of party advisors to ask the cross-examination questions. Commenters argued that some States such as New York have better embodied the settled state of the law by requiring a fair campus adjudicatory process that does not include cross-examination. Commenters asserted that the final regulations should follow the process used by the U.S. Senate during the confirmation hearings for the Honorable Brett Kavanaugh, Associate Justice, Supreme Court of the United States, which process was described by commenters as disallowing any interaction between the accuser and accused, while conducting questioning of each party separately by the Senators and a designated neutral questioner.

Discussion: The Department acknowledges that the Supreme Court has not ruled on what procedures satisfy due process of law under the U.S. Constitution in the specific context of a Title IX sexual harassment grievance process held by a postsecondary institution, and that Federal appellate courts that have considered this particular issue in recent years have taken different approaches. The Department, as an agency of the Federal government, is subject to the U.S. Constitution, including the Fifth Amendment, and cannot interpret Title IX to compel a recipient, whether public or private, to deprive a person of due process rights.[1263] Procedural due process requires, at a minimum, notice and a meaningful opportunity to be heard.[1264] Due process '''is flexible and calls for such procedural protections as the particular situation demands.' '' [1265] ''The fundamental requirement of due process is the opportunity to be heard 'at a meaningful time and in a meaningful manner.' '' [1266]

The Department has determined that the procedures contained in § 106.45 of these final regulations best achieve the purposes of (1) effectuating Title IX's non-discrimination mandate by ensuring fair, reliable outcomes viewed as legitimate in resolution of formal complaints of sexual harassment so that victims receive remedies, (2) reducing and preventing sex bias from affecting outcomes, and (3) ensuring that Title IX regulations are consistent with constitutional due process and fundamental fairness. The procedures in § 106.45 are consistent with constitutional requirements and best serve the foregoing purposes, including the right for both parties to meaningfully be heard by advocating for their own narratives regarding the allegations in a formal complaint of sexual harassment. In recognition that what is a meaningful opportunity to be heard may depend on particular circumstances, the final regulations apply different procedures in different contexts; for example, where an emergency situation presents a threat to physical health or safety, § 106.44(c) permits emergency removal with an opportunity to be heard that occurs after removal. Where a grievance process is initiated to adjudicate the respondent's responsibility for sexual harassment, a live hearing with cross-examination is required in the postsecondary context but not in elementary and secondary schools. These differences appropriately acknowledge that different types of process may be required in different circumstances while prescribing a consistent framework in similar circumstances so that Title IX as a Federal civil rights law protects every person in an education program or activity.

Circuit has held that cross-examination, at least conducted through a party's advisor, is necessary to satisfy due process in sexual misconduct cases that turn on party credibility. ''Due process requires cross-examination in circumstances like these because it is the greatest legal engine ever invented for uncovering the truth.'' [1267] The Sixth Circuit reasoned, ''Cross-examination is essential in cases like Doe's because it does more than uncover inconsistencies—it takes aim at credibility like no other procedural device.'' [1268] The Sixth Circuit in Baum disagreed with the institution's argument that written statements could substitute for cross-examination, explaining that ''[w]ithout the back-and-forth of adversarial questioning, the accused cannot probe the witness's story to test her memory, intelligence, or potential ulterior motives. . . . Nor can the fact-finder observe the witness's demeanor under that questioning. . . . For that reason, written statements cannot substitute for cross-examination. . . . Instead, the university must allow for some form of live questioning in front of the fact-finder,'' though this requirement can be facilitated through modern technology, for example by allowing a witness to be questioned via Skype.[1269] The Sixth Circuit carefully distinguished this cross-examination requirement from the Sixth Amendment right of a criminal defendant to confront witnesses, reasoning that administrative proceedings need not contain the same protections accorded to the accused in criminal proceedings.[1270] The Sixth Circuit further reasoned that ''[u]niversities have a legitimate interest in avoiding procedures that may subject an alleged victim to further harm or harassment . . . [but] the answer is not to deny cross-examination altogether. Instead, the university could allow the accused student's agent to conduct cross-examination on his behalf. After all, an individual aligned with the accused student can accomplish the benefits of cross-examination—its adversarial nature and the opportunity for follow-up—without subjecting the accuser to the emotional trauma of directly confronting her alleged attacker.'' [1271]

The Department agrees with the Sixth Circuit's reasoning that a Title IX grievance process should strike an appropriate balance between avoiding retraumatizing procedures, and ensuring both parties have the right to question each other in a manner that captures the real-time, adversarial benefits of cross-examination to a truth-seeking process. Section 106.45(b)(6)(i) follows the Sixth Circuit's reasoning by requiring recipients to give both parties opportunity for cross-examination, allowing either party to request that cross-examination (and the entire live hearing) be conducted with the parties in separate rooms, ensuring that only party advisors conduct cross-examination and expressly forbidding personal confrontation between parties, and requiring the decision-maker to determine the relevance of a cross-examination question before a party or witness answers.

Commenters correctly note that the Sixth Circuit's rationale in Baum rested on certain limitations or circumstances that justified requiring cross-examination: The Baum opinion was in the context of a public university that owes constitutional due process of law to students and employees; cross-examination is of greatest benefit where a sexual misconduct case turns on credibility and involves serious consequences; and a university that already provided hearings for other types of misconduct could not argue that it faced more than a minimal burden to provide a live hearing for sexual misconduct cases. As explained in the ''Role of Due Process in the Grievance Process'' section of this preamble, the Department understands that some recipients are public institutions that owe constitutional protections to students and employees while other recipients are private institutions that do not owe constitutional protections. However, consistent application of a grievance process to accurately resolve allegations of sexual harassment under Title IX is as important in private institutions as public ones, and the Department therefore adopts a § 106.45 grievance process that results in fair, reliable outcomes in all postsecondary institutions with procedures that, while likely to satisfy constitutional due process requirements, remain independent of constitutional requirements.

The Department notes that while commenters are correct that not every formal complaint of sexual harassment subject to § 106.45 turns on party or witness credibility, other commenters noted that most of these complaints do involve plausible, competing narratives of the alleged incident, making party participation in the process vital for a thorough evaluation of the available, relevant evidence.[1272] The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to clarify that where a party or witness does not appear at a live hearing or refuses to answer cross-examination questions, the decision-maker must disregard statements of that party or witness but must reach a determination without drawing any inferences about the determination regarding responsibility based on the party or witness's failure or refusal to appear or answer questions. Thus, for example, where a complainant refuses to answer cross-examination questions but video evidence exists showing the underlying incident, a decision-maker may still consider the available evidence and make a determination. The Department thus disagrees with commenters who argued that the proposed rules force a party to undergo cross-examination even where the case does not turn on credibility; if the case does not depend on party's or witness's statements but rather on other evidence (e.g., video evidence that does not consist of ''statements'' or to the extent that the video contains non-statement evidence) the decision-maker can still consider that other evidence and reach a determination, and must do so without drawing any inference about the determination based on lack of party or witness testimony. This result thus comports with the Sixth Circuit's rationale in Baum that cross-examination is most needed in cases that involve the need to evaluate credibility of parties as opposed to evaluation of non-statement evidence.[1273] Furthermore,

[1273] See Baum, 903 F.3d at 583–84 (despite the university's contention that prior Sixth Circuit precedent, in Univ. of Cincinnati, 872 F.3d at 395, 402, meant that a respondent is not entitled to cross-examination where the university's decision did not depend entirely on a credibility contest between Roe and Doe, the Baum Court clarified that University of Cincinnati merely held that cross-examination was unnecessary when the university's decision did not rely on any testimonial evidence at all but that case, and Baum, stand for the § 106.45(b)(9) permits recipients to facilitate informal resolution processes (thus avoiding the need to hold a live hearing with cross-examination), which may be particularly desirable by the parties and the recipient in situations where the facts about the underlying incident are not contested by the parties and thus resolution does not turn on resolving competing factual narratives.

With respect to the other limitations commenters asserted that the Sixth Circuit noted in its rationale requiring cross-examination (i.e., that it is a procedure justified where serious consequences such as suspension or expulsion are at issue, and where the burden on a university is minimal), the Department notes that the Baum Court did not rest its rationale on situations where only suspension or expulsion was at issue, but rather the Sixth Circuit observed that ''[b]eing labeled a sex offender by a university has both an immediate and lasting impact on a student's life'' whereby the student ''may be forced to withdraw from his classes and move out of his university housing. His personal relationships might suffer. . . . And he could face difficulty obtaining educational and employment opportunities down the road, especially if he is expelled.'' [1274] The Sixth Circuit thus recognized the high stakes involved with sexual misconduct allegations regardless of whether the sanction is expulsion. Further, the Department doubts that recipients are likely to determine that the type of conduct captured under the § 106.30 definition of sexual harassment would not potentially warrant suspension or expulsion. Additionally, the final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to permit a recipient to hold live hearings virtually, using technology, to ameliorate the administrative burden on colleges and universities that do not already conduct hearings for any type of misconduct allegation.

The Department is aware that after the public comment period on the NPRM closed, the First Circuit decided a Title IX sexual misconduct case in which the First Circuit disagreed with the Sixth Circuit's holding regarding cross-examination.[1275] In Haidak, the First Circuit held that a university could satisfy due process requirements by using an inquisitorial rather than adversarial method of cross-examination, by having a neutral school official pose probing questions of parties and witnesses in real-time, designed to ferret out the truth about the allegations at issue.[1276] The First Circuit reasoned that ''[c]onsiderable anecdotal experience suggests that cross-examination in the hands of an experienced trial lawyer is an effective tool'' but cross-examination performed by the respondent personally might devolve into ''acrimony'' rather than a truth-seeking tool that reduces the risk of erroneous outcomes, while cross-examination conducted by lawyers risks university proceedings mimicking court trials.[1277] Also after the public comment period on the NPRM closed, the First Circuit decided a case [1278] under Massachusetts State law involving discipline of a student by a private college for sexual misconduct, in which the student argued that failure of the recipient to provide any form of ''real-time'' cross-examination violated the recipient's contractual obligation of ''basic fairness'' but the First Circuit held that the private college owed no constitutional due process to the student and that State law did not require any form of real-time cross-examination as part of contractual basic fairness.[1279] As noted elsewhere throughout this preamble, while private colleges do not owe constitutional protections to students or employees, the Department is obligated to interpret Title IX consistent with constitutional guarantees, including the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment guarantees of due process of law, and the Department believes that § 106.45(b)(6)(i) comports with constitutional due process and notions of fundamental fairness while effectuating the non-discrimination mandate of Title IX, even if State laws or a recipient's contract with its students would not impose the same requirements on private colleges.

The Department understands the concerns expressed by commenters, and echoed in the reasoning of the First Circuit in Haidak, that cross-examination conducted personally by students may not effectively contribute to the truth-seeking purpose of a live hearing. Thus, the Department has crafted § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to require postsecondary institution recipients to provide parties with an advisor for the purpose of conducting cross-examination, if a party does not have an advisor of choice at the hearing. This provision avoids the possibility of self-representation where a party personally conducts cross-examination of the opposing party and witnesses, and as commenters supporting cross-examination pointed out, this provision ensures that advisors conducting cross-examination will be either professionals (e.g., attorneys or experienced advocates) or at least adults capable of understanding the purpose and scope of cross-examination. Although no Federal circuit court has interpreted constitutional due process to require recipients to provide counsel to parties in a disciplinary proceeding, the Department has the authority to effectuate the purposes of Title IX by prescribing administrative requirements even when those requirements do not purport to represent a definition of discrimination under the Title IX statute. The Department has determined that requiring postsecondary institutions to provide advisors to parties for the purpose of conducting cross-examination best serves Title IX's non-discrimination mandate by ensuring that adversarial cross-examination occurs, thereby ferreting out the truth of sexual harassment allegations, while protecting sexual harassment victims from personal confrontation with a perpetrator. At the same time, these final regulations expressly state that no party's advisor of choice, and no advisor provided to a party by a recipient, needs to be an attorney, furthering the Department's intent that the § 106.45 grievance process is suitable for implementation in an educational institution without trying to mimic a court trial.

The Department agrees with commenters that Federal case law is split on the specific issue of whether constitutional due process, or basic fairness under a contract theory between a private college and student, requires live cross-examination in sexual misconduct proceedings. The Department disagrees that § 106.45(b)(6)(i) represents overreach, violations of federalism, administrative law, or rule of law, and contends instead that the final regulations prescribe a grievance process carefully tailored to be no more prescriptive than necessary to (1) be consistent with constitutional due process and fundamental fairness, even if § 106.45 includes procedures that exceed proposition that if ''credibility is in dispute and material to the outcome, due process requires cross-examination.''); § 106.45(b)(6)(i) is consistent with this Baum holding inasmuch as the provision bars reliance on statements from witnesses who do not submit to cross-examination, leaving a decision-maker able to consider non-statement evidence that may exist in a particular case.

minimal guarantees, and (2) address the challenges inherent in resolving sexual harassment allegations so that recipients are effectively held responsible for redressing sex discrimination in the form of sexual harassment in recipients' education programs or activities. As noted elsewhere in this preamble, when a recipient draws conclusions about whether sexual harassment occurred in its education program or activity, the recipient is not merely making an internal, private decision about its own affairs; rather, the recipient is making determinations that implicate the recipient's obligation to comply with a Federal civil rights law that requires a recipient to operate education programs or activities free from sex discrimination. The Department therefore has regulatory authority to prescribe a framework for consistent, reliable determinations regarding responsibility for sexual harassment under Title IX.

The Department appreciates that some State laws already require universities to grant cross-examination rights in administrative hearings that apply to students or employees, but the Department disagrees that a university may be required to utilize the cross-examination procedure only if a State law has specifically directed that result. The fact that some States already require public universities to allow cross-examination demonstrates that the concept is familiar to many recipients. The Department is regulating only as far as necessary to enforce the Federal civil rights law at issue; the final regulations govern only student and employee misconduct that constitutes sex discrimination in the form of sexual harassment under Title IX, and does not purport to require postsecondary institutions to utilize cross-examination in non-Title IX matters. The procedures in § 106.45 are consistent with constitutional requirements and best further the purposes of Title IX, including the right for both parties to meaningfully be heard by advocating for the party's own narratives regarding the allegations in a formal complaint of sexual harassment.

A cross-examination procedure does not imply that the credibility of sexual assault complainants is particularly suspect; rather, wherever allegations of serious misconduct involve contested facts, cross-examination is one of the time-tested procedural devices recognized throughout the U.S. legal system as effective in reaching accurate determinations resolving competing versions of events. The Department notes that § 106.45(b)(6)(i) grants the right of cross-examination equally to complainants and respondents, and cross-examination is as useful and powerful a truth-seeking tool for a complainant's benefit as for a respondent, so that a complainant may direct the decision-maker's attention to implausibility, inconsistency, unreliability, ulterior motives, and lack of credibility in the respondent's statements. While the purpose of the Sixth Amendment's right to confront accusers via cross-examination in a criminal proceeding may be to protect the criminal defendant from deprivation of liberty unless guilt is certain beyond a reasonable doubt,[1280] the Department recognizes, and the final regulations reflect, that the purpose of a Title IX grievance process differs from that of a criminal proceeding. Under § 106.45, cross-examination is not for the protection only of respondents, but is rather a device for the benefit of the recipient and both parties, by assisting the decision-maker in reaching a factually accurate determination regarding responsibility so that deprivations of a Federal civil right may be appropriately remedied.

The Department disagrees with commenters who argued that indirect cross-examination conducted by a neutral college administrator, or a submitted questions procedure, which is permissible for elementary and secondary schools under these final regulations,[1281] can adequately ensure a fair process and reliable outcome in postsecondary institutions. Whether or not such a practice would meet constitutional due process requirements, the Department believes that § 106.45 appropriately and reasonably balances the truth-seeking function of live, real-time, adversarial cross-examination in the postsecondary institution context with protections against personal confrontation between the parties. Thus, regardless of whether the provisions in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) are required under constitutional due process of law, the Department believes that these procedures meet or exceed the due process required under Mathews,[1282] and the Department is exercising its regulatory authority under Title IX to adopt measures that the Department has determined best effectuate the purpose of Title IX.[1283] The § 106.45 grievance process requires recipients to remain neutral and impartial throughout the grievance process, including during investigation and adjudication. To require a recipient to step into the shoes of an advocate by asking each party cross-examination questions designed to challenge that party's plausibility, credibility, reliability, motives, and consistency would place the recipient in the untenable position of acting partially (rather than impartially) toward the parties,[1284] or else failing to fully probe the parties' statements for flaws that reflect on the veracity of the party's statements. The Department does not believe that it is acceptable or necessary to place recipients in such a position, because as the Sixth Circuit has outlined, there is an alternative approach that balances the need for adversarial testing of testimony with protection against personal confrontation between the parties. Therefore, § 106.45(b)(6)(i) respects and reinforces the impartiality of the recipient by requiring adversarial questioning to be conducted by party advisors (who by definition need not be impartial because their role is to assist one party and not the other). Precisely because the recipient must provide a neutral, impartial decision-maker, the function of adversarial questioning must be undertaken by persons who owe no duty of impartiality to the parties. Rather, the impartial decision-maker benefits from observing the questions and answers of each party and witness posed by a party's advisor advocating for that party's particular interests in the case. The Department believes that § 106.45(b)(6)(i) prescribes an approach that is both proactive and reactive, for the benefit of the recipient and both parties; that is, the decision-maker has the right and responsibility to ask questions and elicit information from parties and witnesses on the decision-maker's own initiative to aid the decision-maker in obtaining relevant evidence both inculpatory and exculpatory, and the parties also have equal rights to present evidence in front of the decision-maker so the decision-maker has the benefit of perceiving each party's unique perspectives about the evidence.

Of course, the Department of Education could enforce the requirement administratively: Agencies generally have authority to promulgate and enforce requirements that effectuate the statute's non-discrimination mandate, 20 U.S.C. 1682, even if those requirements do not purport to represent a definition of discrimination under the statute.'').

The Department notes, with respect to commenters' arguments in favor of the Harvard Law School's submitted questions model, that a decision-maker must exclude irrelevant questions, and nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient from adopting and enforcing (so long as it is applied clearly, consistently, and equally to the parties [1285]) a rule that deems duplicative questions to be irrelevant, or to impose rules of decorum that require questions to be asked in a respectful manner; however, any such rules adopted by a recipient must ensure that all relevant questions and evidence are admitted and considered (though varying weight or credibility may of course be given to particular evidence by the decision-maker). Thus, for example, where the substance of a question is relevant, but the manner in which an advisor attempts to ask the question is harassing, intimidating, or abusive (for example, the advisor yells, screams, or physically ''leans in'' to the witness's personal space), the recipient may appropriately, evenhandedly enforce rules of decorum that require relevant questions to be asked in a respectful, non-abusive manner.

The Department disagrees that the provision in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) requiring the decision-maker to explain any decision that a cross-examination question is irrelevant means that submission of written questions adequately substitutes for real-time, adversarial questioning. For the reasons explained by the Sixth Circuit, written submission of questions is no substitute for live cross-examination.[1286] The Department agrees with the commenter who argued that engines come in different shapes and sizes, so that the engine of cross-examination may appropriately look different in a Title IX grievance process than in a criminal proceeding. In recognition of these different purposes and contexts, § 106.45 does not attempt to incorporate protections constitutionally guaranteed to criminal defendants such as the Sixth Amendment right to confront accusers face to face, the right of self-representation, or the right to effective assistance of counsel.

The Department appreciates commenters' proposal to modify the real-time cross-examination requirement by requiring party advisors to ask questions one at a time, in full hearing of the other party, while the decision-maker decides whether or not the question should be answered, to better screen out irrelevant or abusive questions. We have revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to reflect the commenters' suggestion; this provision now provides that ''Only relevant cross-examination and other questions may be asked of a party or witness. Before a complainant, respondent, or witness answers a cross-examination question, the decision-maker must first determine whether the question is relevant and explain any decision to exclude a question as not relevant.'' We agree that such a provision better ensures that cross-examination in the out-of-court setting of a campus Title IX proceeding remains focused only on relevant questions and answers.

The Department appreciates commenters' descriptions of State laws that have prescribed grievance procedures for campus sexual misconduct allegations, and of the process utilized by the U.S. Senate during the confirmation hearings for Justice Kavanaugh. The Department has considered sexual misconduct disciplinary proceeding models in use by various individual recipients, prescribed under State laws, used by the U.S. Senate, and suggested by advocacy organizations, and for the reasons previously stated, the Department has carefully selected those procedures in § 106.45 as procedures rooted in principles of due process and appropriately adapted for application when a formal complaint of sexual harassment requires reaching accurate outcomes in education programs or activities.

Changes: We have revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to provide that only relevant cross-examination and other questions may be asked of a party or witness, and before a complainant, respondent, or witness answers a cross-examination question, the decision-maker must first determine whether the question is relevant and explain to the party's advisor asking cross-examination questions any decision to exclude a question as not relevant.

Discourages Participation

Comments: Commenters argued that any process that requires cross-examination will discourage many students, including complainants, respondents, and witnesses, from participating in a Title IX grievance process.[1287] Commenters similarly argued that overseeing cross-examination will discourage recipients' employees, staff, and volunteers from serving as decision-makers or party advisors. At least one commenter argued that undocumented students, and LGBTQ students, will be particularly deterred from reporting sexual assault because cross-examination will make Title IX proceedings more legalistic and undocumented students, and LGBTQ students, are already wary of the criminal justice system.

Discussion: The Department understands commenters' concerns that participation in a formal grievance process may be difficult for participants, including students and employees. The final regulations require recipients to notify students and employees of the recipient's grievance process,[1288] and to train personnel whom the recipient designates to serve as a Title IX Coordinator, investigator, decision-maker, or person who facilitates an [1285] The introductory sentence to § 106.45(b) provides that any rules a recipient adopts to use in the grievance process, other than those necessary to comply with § 106.45, must apply equally to both parties.

[1286] E.g., Doe v. Baum, 903 F.3d 575, 582–83 (6th Cir. 2018) (''Without the back-and-forth of adversarial questioning, the accused cannot probe the witness's story to test her memory, intelligence, or potential ulterior motives. . . . Nor can the fact-finder observe the witness's demeanor under that questioning . . . For that reason, written statements cannot substitute for cross-examination. . . . Instead, the university must allow for some form of live questioning in front of the fact-finder'' though this requirement can be facilitated through modern technology, for example by allowing a witness to be questioned via Skype.'') (internal quotation marks and citations omitted; emphasis in original).

[1287] Commenters cited to information regarding reasons for not reporting such as the data noted in the ''Reporting Data'' subsection of the ''General Support and Opposition'' section of this preamble, in support of arguments that fear of the ordeal of a potential trial already discourages many sexual assault victims from reporting to law enforcement, and making Title IX grievance processes more court-like by requiring cross-examination will have a similar chilling effect on reporting sexual assault to universities.

[1288] Section 106.8(c) (requiring recipients to adopt and publish, and send notice of, the recipient's grievance procedures for complaints of sex discrimination and grievance process for formal complaints of sexual harassment); § 106.45(b)(2) (requiring recipients to send written notice to parties involved in a formal complaint of sexual harassment notice of the recipient's grievance process).

informal resolution.[1289] The final regulations require recipients to allow each party involved in a grievance process to select an advisor of the party's choice, for the purpose of accompanying, advising, and assisting the party with navigating the grievance process. The Department recognizes that the § 106.45 grievance process, including live hearings and cross-examination at postsecondary institutions, constitutes a serious, formal process, and these final regulations ensure that a recipient's educational community is aware of that process and, when involved in the process, each party has the right to assistance from an attorney or non-attorney advisor throughout the process. The final regulations also protect an individual's right to decide not to participate in a grievance process, by including § 106.71 that prohibits retaliation against any person for exercising rights under Title IX, whether by participating or refusing to participate in a Title IX grievance process. While participation in a formal process may be difficult or challenging for a participant, the Department believes that sex discrimination in the form of sexual harassment is a serious matter that warrants a predictable, fair grievance process with strong procedural protections for both parties so that reliable determinations regarding responsibility are reached by the recipient.

While the formality of the § 106.45 grievance process may seem ''legalistic,'' the process is very different from a civil lawsuit or criminal proceeding, such that Title IX grievance processes retain their character as administrative proceedings in an educational environment, focused on resolving allegations that a respondent committed sex discrimination in the form of sexual harassment against a complainant. Recipients retain discretion to communicate with their students and employees (including undocumented students and others who may be wary of the criminal justice system) about the nature of the § 106.45 grievance process and the differences between that process and the criminal justice system, including for example, that the § 106.45 grievance process in a postsecondary institution involves cross-examination by a party's advisor overseen by a trained decision-maker with authority to control the live hearing environment to prevent abusive questioning and make determinations free from bias or sex stereotypes that may constitute evidence of sex discrimination. To make it easier for participants to participate in a live hearing, the final regulations expressly authorize a recipient, in the recipient's discretion, to allow any or all participants to participate in the live hearing virtually.

Changes: The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to expressly allow a recipient to hold the live hearing virtually, with technology enabling participants to see and hear each other.

Financial Inequities

Comments: Many commenters argued that requiring cross-examination will lead to sharp inequities between parties who can afford to hire an attorney and those who cannot afford an attorney, and the credibility of a victim's case will be contingent on the effectiveness of the advisor doing the cross-examination rather than on the merits of the case. Some commenters asserted that this disparity will disfavor complainants because if there is a pending criminal case, a respondent likely will have a court-appointed attorney while a victim is likely to be left without an attorney. At least one commenter pointed to a study showing that only three percent of universities provide victims with legal support.[1290] Commenters asserted that often it is respondents who bring lawyers while complainants more often bring non-lawyer advocates, so requiring advisors to cross-examine will disadvantage complainants.[1291] Commenters argued that the financial disparity will fall hardest on students of color including children of immigrants, international students, and first-generation students, as they are more likely to come from an economically disadvantaged background and cannot afford expensive lawyers. Commenters expressed concern that LGBTQ students will be at greater financial disadvantage than other students.

Discussion: The Department disagrees that the final regulations create inequity between parties based on the financial ability to hire a lawyer as a party's advisor of choice. The final regulations clarify that a party's advisor may be, but is not required to be, an attorney,[1292] and clarify that where a recipient must provide a party with an advisor to conduct cross-examination at a live hearing that advisor may be of the recipient's choice, must be provided without fee or charge to the party, and may be, but is not required to be, an attorney.[1293] The Department understands that complainants and respondents may believe that hiring an attorney as an advisor may be beneficial for the party and that parties often will have different financial means, but the § 106.45 grievance process is designed to permit both parties to navigate the process with assistance from any advisor of choice. The Department disagrees that cross-examination at a live hearing means that a complainant's case will be contingent on the effectiveness of the complainant's advisor. Because cross-examination questions and answers, as well all relevant evidence, is evaluated by a decision-maker trained to be impartial, the professional qualifications of a party's advisor do not determine the outcome. The Department wishes to emphasize that the status of any party's advisor (i.e., whether a party's advisor is an attorney or not) must not affect the recipient's compliance with § 106.45, including the obligation to objectively evaluate relevant evidence. Thus, determinations regarding responsibility will turn on the merits of each case, and not on the professional qualifications of a party's advisor. Regardless of whether certain demographic groups are more or less financially disadvantaged and thus more or less likely to hire an attorney as an advisor of choice, decision-makers in each case must reach determinations based on the evidence and not solely based on the skill of a party's advisor in conducting cross-examination. The Department also notes that the final regulations require a trained investigator to prepare an investigative report summarizing relevant evidence, and permit the decision-maker on the decision-maker's own initiative to ask questions and elicit testimony from parties and witnesses, as part of the recipient's burden to reach a determination regarding responsibility based on objective evaluation of all relevant evidence including inculpatory and exculpatory evidence. Thus, the skill of a party's advisor is not the only factor in bringing evidence to light for a decision-maker's consideration.

The Department disagrees that respondents are advantaged due to having a court-appointed lawyer for a concurrent criminal case, because a Title IX grievance process is independent from a criminal case and a court-appointed lawyer in a criminal matter would not be court-appointed to represent the criminal defendant in a recipient's Title IX grievance process.

The Department disagrees that LGBTQ students are necessarily at a greater financial disadvantage than other students; however, the final regulations ensure that all students, including LGBTQ students, have an equal opportunity to select an advisor of choice.

Changes: The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to specify that where a recipient must provide a party with an advisor to conduct cross-examination at a live hearing, that advisor may be of the recipient's choice, must be provided without fee or charge to the party, and may be, but is not required to be, an attorney.

Changes the Nature of the Grievance Process

Comments: Some commenters asserted that cross-examination shifts the burden of adjudication from the recipient onto the parties. Many commenters asserted that extensive training will be necessary for hearing panelists and advisors conducting cross-examination, and recipients will not have the resources, time, and money to make cross-examination workable, leading to chaos.[1294]

Many commenters argued that requiring adversarial cross-examination will fundamentally change the nature of educational disciplinary proceedings, converting them into quasi-legal trials. Commenters argued that requiring postsecondary institutions to hold live hearings with cross-examination deprives institutions of the freedom to structure their processes according to their individual needs, resources, and educational communities and compels institutions to abandon alternative models they have carefully developed over many years, constituting an overly prescriptive mandate that fails to defer to school officials' expertise in developing adjudication models that are fair, humane, in alignment with State and Federal laws, and address a recipient's unique circumstances. Other commenters argued that requiring live hearings with cross-examination fails to recognize Federal court admonitions that universities are ill-equipped to handle the formalities and procedural complexities common to criminal trials, that education is a university's first priority with adjudication of student disputes ''at best, a distant second,'' [1295] and due process does not require a university to ''transform its classrooms into courtrooms.'' [1296]

One commenter argued that the cross-examination requirement could violate court-issued restraining orders prohibiting contact between the parties.

Discussion: The final regulations ensure that the burden of gathering evidence, and the burden of proof, remain on the recipient, not on either party.[1297] While the parties have strong procedural rights to participate and advocate for their own position throughout the § 106.45 grievance process, the right to meaningfully participate does not shift the burden away from the recipient or onto the parties. The Department notes that while decision-makers must be trained to serve impartially and avoid prejudgment of the facts at issue, bias, and conflicts of interest, the final regulations do not require training for advisors of choice. This is because the recipient is responsible for reaching an accurate determination regarding responsibility while remaining impartial, yet a party's ability to rely on assistance from an advisor should not be limited by imposing training requirements on advisors, who by definition need not be impartial because their function is to assist one particular party. While the Department understands that recipients will need to dedicate resources to train Title IX personnel, including decision-makers overseeing live hearings, the benefits of a fair grievance process for resolving formal complaints of sexual harassment under Title IX outweigh the costs of training personnel to implement that fair grievance process. For similar reasons, the benefits of a consistent, predictable grievance process outweigh commenters' concerns that the § 106.45 grievance process leaves too little flexibility for recipients to craft their own processes. As noted elsewhere in this preamble, when resolving factual allegations of sexual harassment under Title IX, recipients are not simply applying a recipient's own code of conduct; rather, recipients are reaching determinations affecting rights of students and employees under a Federal civil rights law. Far from turning classrooms into courtrooms, the § 106.45 grievance process incorporates procedures the Department has determined are most needed in the Title IX sexual harassment context to result in reliable outcomes viewed as legitimate by the parties and the public. Cross-examination in the postsecondary institution context is widely viewed as a critical part of a fair process, and as such giving both parties the right to cross-examination improves the reality and perception that recipients' Title IX grievance processes are fair and legitimate.[1298] Each aspect of the grievance process, while rooted in principles of due process, is adapted for implementation by recipients in the context of education programs or activities, thereby acknowledging that schools, colleges, and universities exist first and foremost to educate, and not to mirror courts of law. Thus, for the benefit of all students including those who are wary of the criminal justice system, a Title IX grievance process remains a separate, distinct forum.

The Department disagrees that the final regulations require recipients to violate court-issued restraining orders. Section 106.45(b)(6)(i) requires recipients to conduct the entire live hearing (not only cross-examination) with the parties located in separate rooms, upon any party's request, and cross-examination must be conducted by a party's advisor and never by the party personally. Further, the final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to expressly allow a recipient to hold the live hearing virtually (including for witness participation), with technology enabling participants to see and hear each other. Thus, where a court-issued restraining order prohibits contact between the parties, the final regulations do not require any in-person proximity between the parties, or any direct communication between the

Section 106.45(b)(6)(ii) Should Apply to Postsecondary Institutions

Comments: Several commenters argued that because the Department permits written questioning in elementary and secondary schools, there is no reason to believe that the same process would not be equally effective in postsecondary institutions, especially when students of the same age could be subjected to the two different processes (e.g., a 17 year old high school student, versus a 17 year old college student). One commenter argued that cross-examination is either important in a quest for truth or it is not, and that if elementary and secondary schools have discretion to decide whether cross-examination is beneficial, postsecondary institutions should have the same discretion. One commenter stated that community colleges often enroll high school students in dual enrollment programs, and under the proposed rules a high school student would face a different process depending on whether a sexual assault occurred at their high school or at the community college where they are taking classes.

Commenters argued that the same ''sensitivities associated with age and developmental ability'' relied on by the Department to justify not requiring live hearings and cross-examination in elementary and secondary schools [1299] remain a consideration with young adults in college, especially in cases about personal, intimate details of a sexual nature. Commenters argued that modern neuroscience has established that adolescence, in terms of brain development, extends well beyond the teenage years, and the prefrontal cortex—the part of the brain primarily responsible for executive functioning—typically does not fully develop until the early to mid-twenties,[1300] when many students have already graduated from college and thus until approximately age 25 students do not function as rational adults and rely heavily on their emotions when making decisions.[1301]

Commenters argued that when OCR conducts an investigation into violations of Title IX, schools have no right to question witnesses (or even to know who the witnesses are), and because the Department nevertheless presumably believes the procedures set out in its OCR Case Processing Manual are fair and produce reliable results there is no reason why a recipient needs to include cross-examination of parties and witnesses in a sexual misconduct case in order to have a fair process that reaches reliable results.

Commenters noted that Title IX and student conduct experts oppose the proposed rules' cross-examination requirement and instead favor submission of written questions or asking questions posed by a neutral school official, referencing publications from organizations such as the Association of Title IX Administrators (ATIXA), the Association for Student Conduct Administration (ASCA), and the American Bar Association (ABA) Criminal Justice Section. One commenter described a survey the commenter distributed regarding the proposed rules and stated that out of the 597 people surveyed, 81 percent disapproved of the proposed rules' cross-examination requirement. Another commenter pointed to a different public opinion poll that indicated that 61 percent of those surveyed agreed that students accused of sexual assault on college campuses should have the right to cross-examine their accuser.

One commenter suggested that the final regulations should require the recipient to provide a neutral person to conduct cross-examination of parties and witnesses. One commenter asked whether parties' submission of questions to be asked through a hearing board chair fulfills the proposed rules' cross-examination requirement; whether students may choose to conduct the cross-examination themselves instead of through an advisor; and whether a Title IX Coordinator who filed a formal complaint must then be cross-examined at the hearing.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support for § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) making hearings optional and requiring submission of written questions by parties directed to other parties and witnesses, in the elementary and secondary school context, and understands commenters' arguments that the same procedures should apply in postsecondary institutions. The Department acknowledges that there is no clear line between the ages of students in elementary and secondary schools versus in postsecondary institutions (e.g., a 17 year old might be in high school, or might be in college, or might be dually enrolled). As discussed in the ''Directed Questions'' section of this preamble, the Department appreciates commenters' arguments for and against differences in provisions based on the age of a student versus differentiating between elementary and secondary schools on the one hand, and postsecondary institutions on the other hand. The Department believes that it is desirable, to the extent feasible, to achieve consistency in application of Title IX rights across all recipients, because all students participating in education programs or activities regardless of age deserve the protections of Title IX's non-discrimination mandate. The Department also believes that with respect to the unique circumstances presented by sex discrimination in the form of sexual harassment, a consistent, predictable framework can be prescribed while also adapting certain procedures for elementary and secondary schools so that the general framework is more reasonable and effective for students in elementary and secondary schools, who tend to be younger than the average college student. Thus, for example, the final regulations revise the definition of actual knowledge to include notice of sexual harassment to any employee in the elementary and secondary school context,[1302] and revise § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) to more clearly state that elementary and secondary school recipients do not need to use a hearing model to adjudicate formal complaints of sexual harassment.

Similarly, with respect to cross-examination, the Department has concluded that the approach utilized for postsecondary institutions, whereby party advisors conduct cross-examination during a live hearing, is not necessarily effective in elementary and secondary schools where most students tend to be under the age of majority and where (especially for very young students) parents or guardians would likely exercise a party's rights.[1303] Therefore, for example, a parent writing out answers to questions about a sexual harassment incident on behalf of a second-grade student is likely to be a more reasonable procedure than [1303] We have added § 106.6(g) to expressly acknowledge the legal rights of parents and guardians to act on behalf of complainants, respondents, and other individuals with respect to exercise of Title IX rights, including but not limited to the filing of a formal complaint. The legal right of a parent or guardian to act on a party's behalf extends throughout the grievance process.

expecting the second-grader to answer questions in real-time during a hearing. Conversely, in the postsecondary institution context where students generally are young adults, such a party can reasonably be expected to answer questions during a live hearing and to benefit from the procedural right to question the other party (through the asking party's advisor). The Department's cross-examination requirement in postsecondary institutions is based on a practical determination that cross-examination is a valuable procedural tool benefiting both parties, whereas in the elementary and secondary school context the parties are likely to be under the age of majority and would not necessarily benefit from cross-examination as a procedural device. The Department notes that current regulations and guidance do not require consistency between the procedures applied in a high school, and in a college, such that a 17 year old in high school, or in college, would face potentially different grievance procedures in these situations; the final regulations do not increase that discrepancy.

The Department acknowledges the research pointed to by commenters indicating that the brains of young adults are still developing until a person is in their early or even mid-twenties. However, the laws of nearly every State recognize a person age 18 or older as capable of legally acting on the person's own behalf[1304] (for example, by entering into binding contracts), and the Department maintains that individuals developmentally capable enough to enroll in college are also capable enough to make decisions about and participate in a grievance process designed to advance the person's rights.[1305]

The Department reiterates that in recognition that young adults may find navigating a grievance process challenging, the final regulations preserve each party's right to select an advisor of choice to assist the party. The Department's concern for each party's ability to receive emotional and personal support though a grievance process is also discussed in this preamble under § 106.45(b)(5)(iii), providing that a recipient cannot restrict a party's ability to discuss the allegations; this applies to a young adult's desire to discuss the allegations with a parent, friend, or advocate to receive emotional, practical, or strategic advice and support, as well as the right to discuss the allegations with a professional (such as a lawyer). The Department believes that a young adult in college is capable of participating in a grievance process, including answering questions at a live hearing, even if the young adult's frontal cortex is still developing, and the Department respects the legal and policy determinations of the vast majority of States that have granted legal rights and responsibilities to young adults age 18 or older. In recognition that sexual misconduct matters involve sensitive, often traumatic issues for victims of any age, the final regulations ensure that any complainant regardless of age can insist that cross-examination (and the entire live hearing) occur with the parties in separate rooms, and revise § 106.45(b)(6)(i) further to grant recipients the discretion to hold the entire live hearing virtually with use of technology so that witnesses also may appear virtually.

The Department appreciates commenters' observations that the Department's OCR investigations utilize procedures that do not include allowing a recipient under investigation for Title IX violations to cross-examine witnesses interviewed by OCR. For the reasons discussed in the ''Role of Due Process in the Grievance Process'' section of this preamble, the Department has determined that the procedures reflected in § 106.45 represent those procedures most likely to result in fair, reliable outcomes in the particular context of a recipient's need to accurately resolve sexual harassment allegations in order to provide remedies to sexual harassment victims—a context and purpose that differs from that of the Department's investigation into a recipient's compliance with Title IX.

The Department acknowledges that various experts in Title IX matters support a process of posing questions through a hearing officer or neutral school official, and that public opinion surveys may show various levels of support or opposition to the idea of cross-examination in college disciplinary proceedings. However, for the reasons discussed above, the Department has determined that in the postsecondary institution context, the tool of cross-examination benefits both parties and contributes to the truth-seeking purpose of the § 106.45 grievance process. The Department appreciates commenters' proposed revision that recipients simply be directed to give the parties opportunity to challenge credibility and require the decision-maker to ''reasonably assess credibility.'' The Department believes that the final regulations accomplish that directive, by giving the parties equal opportunity to challenge credibility (through written questions for non-postsecondary institutions, and through cross-examination for postsecondary institutions) and by obligating the decision-maker to reach a determination regarding responsibility by objectively evaluating all relevant evidence. The Department appreciates a commenter's suggestion that recipients be required to provide a neutral person to conduct cross-examination on behalf of both parties. However, for the reasons discussed above, the Department does not believe that the benefits of adversarial cross-examination can be achieved when conducted by a person ostensibly designated as a ''neutral'' official. This is because the function of cross-examination is precisely not to be neutral but rather to point out in front of the neutral decision-maker each party's unique perspective about relevant evidence and desire regarding the outcome of the case.

In response to a commenter's question as to whether requiring written submission of questions at a live hearing would fulfill the cross-examination requirement described in § 106.45(b)(6)(i), the final regulations revise that provision to add the phrase ''directly, orally, and in real time'' to describe how cross-examination must be conducted, to clarify that submission of written questions, even during a live hearing, is not compliant with § 106.45(b)(6)(i). In answer to a commenter's further question, the Department has revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to expressly preclude a party from conducting cross-examination personally; the only method for conducting cross-examination is by a party's advisor.

In response to a commenter's question about whether a Title IX Coordinator must be cross-examined in situations where the Title IX Coordinator filed the formal complaint that triggered the grievance process, the final regulations revise § 106.30 defining ''formal complaint'' to clarify that where a formal complaint is signed by a Title IX Coordinator, the Title IX Coordinator does not become a party and must comply with all provisions in § 106.45, including the training requirement and the avoidance of bias and conflict of interest. Thus, where the Title IX Coordinator signed the formal complaint that initiated the grievance process, neither § 106.45(b)(6)(i) nor other provisions in § 106.45 treat the Title IX Coordinator as a party. Even where the Title IX Coordinator testifies as a witness, the Title IX Coordinator is still expected to serve impartially without prejudgment of the facts at issue. The Department notes that the recipient would not be obligated to provide the Title IX Coordinator with an advisor because that obligation attaches only where a party does not have an advisor of choice at a hearing.

Changes: The final regulations add to § 106.45(b)(6)(i) that cross-examination at a live hearing must be conducted directly, orally, and in real time by the party's advisor of choice, notwithstanding the discretion paragraph (b)(5)(iv) to otherwise restrict the extent to which advisors may participate in the proceedings. The final regulations further revise § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to provide that recipients may hold the live hearing virtually, with technology enabling participants to see and hear each other. The final regulations revise the definition of ''formal complaint'' in § 106.30 to clarify that even where a Title IX Coordinator signs a formal complaint, this does not make the Title IX Coordinator a ''party'' in the grievance process.

False Accusations Occur Infrequently

Commenters: Many commenters argued that because false allegations occur infrequently,[1306] it is unnecessary to give the accused extra protections like cross-examination; commenters urged the Department to replace cross-examination with submission of written questions, or asking questions through a neutral school official, to better protect survivors instead of protecting a minority of falsely-accused students. Commenters argued that an adequate regulatory provision would simply say ''The recipient's grievance procedure must include an opportunity for parties to challenge the credibility of witnesses and the other party. The decision-maker must reasonably assess credibility of witnesses and parties'' thus leaving recipients discretion to decide how to meet those requirements.

Discussion: The Department disagrees that cross-examination in the Title IX grievance process is intended only to protect respondents against false allegations; rather, as discussed above, cross-examination in the § 106.45 grievance process is intended to give both parties equal opportunity to meaningfully challenge the plausibility, reliability, credibility, and consistency of the other party and witnesses so that the outcome of each individual case is more likely to be factually accurate, reducing the likelihood of either type of erroneous outcome (i.e., inaccurately finding a respondent to be responsible, or inaccurately finding a respondent to be non-responsible). For that reason, we do not believe the alternate regulatory language suggested by the commenters is sufficient. Despite commenters' assertions, the Department has not designed these final regulations to specifically address false allegations, or in response to any preconceived notions about the frequency of false allegations.

Changes: None.

Excluding Cross-Examination Questions

Comments: Commenters noted that the proposed regulations impose a duty on recipients to objectively evaluate relevant evidence, and deem questions about a complainant's prior sexual behavior to be irrelevant (with two exceptions), but commenters argued that the proposed rules failed to clarify whether recipients have discretion to exclude relevant cross-examination questions on other public policy grounds on which rules of evidence in civil and criminal matters often exclude evidence, for example, party statements made during mediation discussions, out of court statements that constitute hearsay, evidence of a party's general character or prior bad acts, or evidence that is cumulative, duplicative, or unduly prejudicial. Commenters argued that the final regulations should either identify admissibility rules in addition to relevance, or clarify whether decision-makers have the authority to exclude relevant evidence for these kinds of policy reasons (or because State law requires exclusion of types of evidence). Commenters wondered what standards the Department would apply to review whether the recipient's evidentiary rules comply with these final regulations, if recipients do have authority to promulgate rules excluding certain types of evidence. Commenters argued that if relevance is the only allowable admissibility rule then hearings will become even more protracted and unwieldy and decision-makers should thus have discretion to identify appropriate grounds, other than relevance, for excluding evidence.

Discussion: Commenters correctly observed that the proposed rules impose a duty on recipients to objectively evaluate all relevant evidence including inculpatory and exculpatory evidence.[1307] The final regulations revise the language in § 106.45(b)(6)(i)–(ii) to state more clearly that (subject to the two exceptions in those provisions [1308]) questions and evidence about a complainant's prior sexual behavior or predisposition are not relevant, bar the use of information protected by any legally recognized privilege,[1309] and provide that a recipient cannot use a party's treatment records without the party's voluntary, written consent.[1310] (Pursuant to § 106.45(b)(5)(i), if the party is not an ''eligible student,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3, then the recipient must obtain the voluntary, written consent of a ''parent,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3.) The Department appreciates the opportunity to clarify here that the final regulations do not allow a recipient to impose rules of evidence that result in [1306] Commenters cited to information regarding infrequency of false allegations such as the data noted in the ''False Allegations'' subsection of the ''General Support and Opposition'' section of this preamble.

[1307] Section 106.45(b)(1)(ii).

[1308] As discussed below, the rape shield language in § 106.45(b)(6)(i)–(ii) bars questions or evidence about a complainant's sexual predisposition (with no exceptions) and about a complainant's prior sexual behavior subject to two exceptions: If offered to prove that someone other than the respondent committed the alleged sexual harassment, or if the question or evidence concerns sexual behavior between the complainant and the respondent and is offered to prove consent.

[1309] Section 106.45(b)(1)(x) (protecting any legally recognized privileged information from disclosure or use during a grievance process). This provision would therefore prohibit cross-examination (or other) questions that seek disclosure of, for example, information protected by attorney-client privilege.

[1310] Section 106.45(b)(5)(i) (stating that the recipient cannot access, consider, disclose, or otherwise use a party's records that are made or maintained by a physician, psychiatrist, psychologist, or other recognized professional or paraprofessional in connection with the provision of treatment to the party, unless the recipient obtains that party's voluntary, written consent to do so for a grievance process. If the party is not an ''eligible student,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3 (i.e., FERPA regulations), then the recipient must obtain the voluntary, written consent of a ''parent,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3.).

exclusion of relevant evidence; the decision-maker must consider relevant evidence and must not consider irrelevant evidence.

The Department appreciates commenters' concerns that comprehensive rules of evidence adopted in civil and criminal courts throughout the U.S. legal system apply detailed, complex rules to certain types of evidence resulting in exclusion of evidence that is otherwise relevant to further certain public policy values (e.g., exclusion of statements made during settlement negotiations, exclusion of hearsay subject to specifically-defined exceptions, exclusion of character or prior bad act evidence subject to certain exceptions, exclusion of relevant evidence when its probative value is substantially outweighed by risk of prejudice, and other admissibility rules). The Department desires to prescribe a grievance process adapted for an educational environment rather than a courtroom, and declines to impose a comprehensive, detailed set of evidentiary rules for resolution of contested allegations of sexual harassment under Title IX. Rather, the Department has carefully considered the procedures most needed to result in fair, accurate, and legitimate outcomes in Title IX grievance processes. To that end, the Department has determined that recipients must consider relevant evidence with the following conditions: A complainant's prior sexual behavior is irrelevant (unless questions or evidence about prior sexual behavior meet one of two exceptions, as noted above); information protected by any legally recognized privilege cannot be used; no party's treatment records may be used without that party's voluntary, written consent; [1311] and statements not subject to cross-examination in postsecondary institutions cannot be relied on by the decision-maker. The Department notes that where evidence is duplicative of other evidence, a recipient may deem the evidence not relevant.

The Department does not believe that requiring recipients to evaluate relevant evidence results in unfairness or inaccuracy. Unlike court trials where often the trier of fact consists of a jury of laypersons untrained in evidentiary matters, the final regulations require decision-makers to be trained in how to conduct a grievance process and how to serve impartially, and specifically including training in how to determine what questions and evidence are relevant. The fact that decision-makers in a Title IX grievance process must be trained to perform that role means that the same well-trained decision-maker will determine the weight or credibility to be given to each piece of evidence, and the training required under § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) allows recipients flexibility to include substantive training about how to assign weight or credibility to certain types or categories of evidence, so long as any such training promotes impartiality and treats complainants and respondents equally. Thus, for example, where a cross-examination question or piece of evidence is relevant, but concerns a party's character or prior bad acts, under the final regulations the decision-maker cannot exclude or refuse to consider the relevant evidence, but may proceed to objectively evaluate that relevant evidence by analyzing whether that evidence warrants a high or low level of weight or credibility, so long as the decision-maker's evaluation treats both parties equally [1312] by not, for instance, automatically assigning higher weight to exculpatory character evidence than to inculpatory character evidence. While the Department will enforce these final regulations to ensure that recipients comply with the § 106.45 grievance process, including accurately determining whether evidence is relevant, the Department notes that § 106.44(b)(2) assures recipients that, when enforcing these final regulations, the Department will refrain from second guessing a recipient's determination regarding responsibility based solely on whether the Department would have weighed the evidence differently. That provision therefore reinforces the approach to the grievance process throughout § 106.45 under which a recipient must objectively evaluate all relevant evidence (inculpatory and exculpatory) but retains discretion, to which the Department will defer, with respect to how persuasive a decision-maker finds particular evidence to be.

Changes: The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(6)(i)–(ii) to clarify questions and evidence about the complainant's sexual predisposition is never relevant and about a complainant's prior sexual behavior are not relevant with two exceptions: Where the question or evidence about sexual behavior is offered to prove that someone other than the respondent committed the alleged misconduct, or where the question or evidence relates to sexual behavior between the complainant and respondent and is offered to prove consent. The final regulations add § 106.45(b)(1)(x) to prevent disclosure or use during a grievance process of information protected by a legally recognized privilege. The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(5)(i) to bar a recipient from using a party's treatment records without the party's voluntary, written consent. The final regulations also revise the introductory sentence of § 106.45(b) to provide that any provisions, rules, or practices other than those required by § 106.45 that a recipient adopts as part of its grievance process must apply equally to both parties.

Section 106.45(b)(6)(i) Postsecondary Institution Recipients Must Provide Live Hearing With Cross-Examination

Self-Representation Versus Cross-Examination Conducted by Advisors

Comments: Some commenters opposed § 106.45(b)(6)(i) because that provision restricts cross-examination to being conducted by a party's advisor, foreclosing the option for a respondent (or complainant) to be self-represented and conduct cross-examination personally. Commenters argued that the right of self-representation has a long history under U.S. constitutional law, and that the Supreme Court has held that States cannot force an attorney on an unwilling criminal defendant,[1313] that the Sixth Amendment's right to confront witnesses applies to the accused, not to lawyers,[1314] and that representing oneself affirms the dignity and autonomy of the accused.[1315]

Commenters asserted that the final regulations should be modified so that ''in the event that the advisor assigned by a recipient is unacceptable to the respondent, the respondent must have the right to self-represent in all cross-examinations.''

Some commenters suggested that this provision should be modified to allow students to confer with their advisors and for advisors to actively represent the student during any part of a live hearing. At least one commenter argued [1311] Pursuant to § 106.45(b)(5)(i), if the party is not an ''eligible student,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3 (i.e., FERPA regulations), then the recipient must obtain the voluntary, written consent of a ''parent,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3.

[1312] The final regulations revise the introductory sentence of § 106.45(b) to provide: ''Any provisions, rules, or practices other than those required by § 106.45 that a recipient adopts as part of its grievance process for handling formal complaints of sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, must apply equally to both parties.'' that students should be allowed to have a confidential advisor, or confidential advocate, allowed to accompany the party to the hearing, in addition to an advisor of choice or assigned advisor for cross-examination purposes.

Some commenters supported the proposed rules' requirement that if a party does not have an advisor of choice at a hearing, the recipient would be required to provide an advisor ''aligned with that party'' to ensure that each party's interest is represented during the hearing. At least one commenter urged the Department to require that such an appointed advisor be ''genuinely aligned'' with the party, because recipient employees appointed as advisors may be loyal to the institution and not to the party, or may hold ideological beliefs that align with complainants or respondents.

Many commenters opposed the provision in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) that requires recipients to provide a party with an advisor to conduct cross-examination if a party does not have an advisor at a live hearing. Commenters particularly objected to the language in the NPRM requiring a recipient-provided advisor to be ''aligned with that party'' because: Recipients will find it impossible to ensure parity between the parties; recipients will face additional litigation risks stemming from the recipient's provision of advisors for parties (such as claims by parties that the recipient provided an incompetent advisor, an advisor not sufficiently ''aligned with the party,'' or ineffective assistance of counsel); the NPRM provided no guidance about how a recipient should determine whether an advisor is ''aligned with'' a party; especially in smaller institutions, a recipient's obligation to appoint an advisor who must conduct cross-examination adverse to another student or employee presents potential conflicts of interest (particularly because appointed advisors are likely to be administrators, professors, or other recipient staff who interact with both parties outside the grievance process) and pitting a recipient's employee against a recipient's student is antithetical to recipients' educational mission.[1316] Commenters argued that requiring recipients to appoint party-aligned advisors contradicts the expectation that the recipient is neutral and impartial toward the parties, and that educational disciplinary processes are not about building a case for or against a party but simply gathering as much information as possible; these commenters stated that § 106.45(b)(6)(i) abandons institutions' processes that are ''built to assemble the voices and experiences of the parties involved, not the voices of third-party advisors.''

Commenters asserted that many recipient employees will not wish to be viewed as providing support or advocacy to one party over another, including in instances where the advisor believes the party to whom the advisor is assigned is lying. Commenters asserted that currently, many recipients provide advisors to parties but such advisors are neutral, advising a party about the grievance process itself but not advocating on behalf of the party or serving as a party's proxy, and commenters argued that instead of requiring assigned advisors to be ''aligned with'' the party the provision should require that assigned advisors be knowledgeable about university processes and able to give neutral advice to the party. Other commenters asserted that this provision should require recipients to give parties advice about selecting advisors but not require recipients to provide advisors to parties. Commenters argued that the final regulations should state that a party's advisor cannot be a person who exercises any administrative or academic authority over the other party. Commenters asserted that party advisors should be required to agree to a code of conduct prohibiting hostile, abusive, or irrelevant questioning.

Some commenters argued that it is vital that both parties have advisors of equal competency during the hearing and thus requested that the final regulations require recipients to appoint attorneys for both parties, or wherever one party has hired an attorney,[1317] or upon the request of a party. Commenters suggested that this provision be modified to allow any party without an advisor of choice at a hearing to select an advisor of the party's choice from a panel of advisors whom the recipient has trained to be familiar with the recipient's grievance process.

Other commenters expressed concern that the requirement for advisors to conduct cross-examination and for recipients to provide advisors for parties who do not have one risks a de facto ''arms race'' whereby if a respondent hires an attorney, recipients will feel pressured to hire an attorney for the complainant to ensure equity, and this will be too costly for many recipients. Commenters similarly asserted that recipients will feel compelled to ensure that assigned advisors are attorneys because it will be crucial that a party and an assigned advisor communicate candidly which requires attorney-client privilege so that conversations are non-discoverable in subsequent civil or criminal matters. Commenters argued that it is likely that State bar associations will find that conducting cross-examination constitutes practice of law and thus recipients will end up being required to hire attorneys for parties, and not simply assign non-attorney advisors.[1318] Commenters argued that this amounts to a costly, unfunded mandate that will create a niche market for litigation-attorney advisors.

Commenters argued that a party disappointed about the outcome of the hearing should not be allowed to challenge the adequacy of the advisor provided by the university, either on appeal or in subsequent litigation.

Commenters argued that the Department lacks statutory authorization under Title IX to require recipients to provide advisors to students, and that such a requirement does not serve to further Title IX's non-discrimination mandate.

Commenters requested clarification of this provision to answer questions such as: Who may determine whether an assigned advisor is aligned with the party, and what factors should be used in making that determination? Is the assigned advisor expected to assume the party's version of events is accurate? If one party hires an attorney as an advisor of choice and the recipient must provide an advisor for the other party, must the recipient assign that party an attorney? Can recipients limit the participation of advisors in a hearing, other than conducting cross-examination? May a recipient impose cost or fee limitations on attorneys chosen by parties to make equity and parity more likely? Could a school allow advisors of choice but appoint separate advisors to conduct cross-examination? If a party shows up at a hearing without an advisor, must the recipient stop the hearing to appoint an advisor for the party? May a decision-maker punish a party if the party's advisor breaks rules during the hearing? Can a party decide during a hearing to ''fire'' the assigned advisor? Can a party delay a hearing by refusing to accept a recipient's assigned advisor perhaps by arguing that the advisor is not ''aligned with'' the party? May the party advisors also conduct direct examination of the party they are advising, or only cross-examination of the other parties and witnesses? Must a recipient provide an advisor for a party who is also an employee of the recipient, including at-will employees? May a recipient require certain training and competency assessments for assigned advisors? Some commenters asserted that the final regulations should require training for appointed advisors, including at a minimum how to conduct cross-examination and how to respond to cross-examination conducted by an attorney, so that parties feel adequately represented.

Discussion: The Department understands commenters who argued for a right of self-representation, but the Department has concluded that self-representation by parties in a live hearing in the context of a Title IX adjudication presents substantial risk of diminishing the effectiveness and benefits of cross-examination while increasing the probability that parties will feel traumatized by the prospect and reality of personal confrontation. As explained above, the Department believes that cross-examination is a valuable tool serving the truth-seeking function of a Title IX grievance process. However, the right to cross-examination is not unfettered and the effectiveness of cross-examination depends on the circumstances presented in many Title IX sexual harassment cases whereby a complainant and respondent have alleged and denied commission of traumatic, violative acts. To retain the benefits of cross-examination in this sensitive, high-stakes context, the Department has concluded that restrictions on the right of cross-examination best serve the purposes of a Title IX adjudication.

The context and purpose of a Title IX adjudication differ significantly from that of a criminal trial. The Sixth Amendment rights guaranteed to a criminal defendant are not constitutionally guaranteed to a respondent in a Title IX adjudication,[1319] and the Department does not believe that a right of self-representation would best effectuate the purposes of Title IX. The Department believes that the final regulations appropriately give respondents and complainants equal and meaningful opportunity to select their own advisors of choice and to thereby direct and control the manner by which a party exercises a right of cross-examination. The final regulations thus do not ''force an attorney'' onto a respondent (or complainant). Rather, the final regulations provide as a back-stop that if a party does not (or cannot) take the opportunity to select an advisor of choice, rather than conducting cross-examination personally the recipient will provide the party an advisor for that purpose. A party always retains the right not to participate in a grievance process, but where the party does wish to participate and advance the party's interests in the case outcome, with respect to testing the credibility of testimony via cross-examination, the party must do this by selecting an advisor of choice, or else working with an advisor provided to the party (without fee or charge) by the recipient. The Department notes that the final regulations, § 106.45(b)(5)(iv) and § 106.45(b)(6)(i), make clear that the choice or presence of a party's advisor cannot be limited by the recipient. To meet this obligation a recipient also cannot forbid a party from conferring with the party's advisor, although a recipient has discretion to adopt rules governing the conduct of hearings that could, for example, include rules about the timing and length of breaks requested by parties or advisors and rules forbidding participants from disturbing the hearing by loudly conferring with each other.

With respect to allowing parties to be accompanied by a confidential advisor or advocate in addition to a party's chosen or assigned advisor, the Department notes that § 106.71 states ''The recipient must keep confidential the identity of any individual who has made a report or complaint of sex discrimination, including any individual who has made a report or filed a formal complaint of sexual harassment, any complainant, any individual who has been reported to be the perpetrator of sex discrimination, any respondent, and any witness, except as may be permitted by the FERPA statute or regulations, 20 U.S.C. 1232g and 34 CFR part 99, or as required by law, or to carry out the purposes of [34 CFR part 106], including the conduct of any investigation, hearing, or judicial proceeding arising thereunder'' and this restriction may limit a recipient's ability to authorize the parties to be accompanied at the hearing by persons other than advisors. For example, a person assisting a party with a disability, or a language interpreter, may accompany a party to the hearing without violating § 106.71(a) because such a person's presence at the hearing is required by law and/or necessary to conduct the hearing. The sensitivity and high stakes of a Title IX sexual harassment grievance process weigh in favor of protecting the confidentiality of the identity and parties to the extent feasible (unless otherwise required by law), and the Department thus declines to authorize that parties may be accompanied to a live hearing by persons other than the parties' advisors, or other persons for reasons ''required by law'' as described above.

The Department is persuaded by commenters' concerns that the ''aligned with that party'' language in this provision posed unnecessary confusion and potential problems. As a result, the Department has removed that language from § 106.45(b)(6)(i). Accordingly, the Department declines to adopt a commenter's suggestion to specify that the assigned advisor must be ''genuinely aligned'' with the party. The Department does not believe it is feasible, necessary, or appropriate to ask recipients to screen potential assigned advisors' ideological beliefs or ties of loyalty to the recipient. The Department is persuaded by commenters' concerns that a condition of ''alignment'' with a party exposes recipients to claims by parties that, in the party's subjective view, an assigned advisor was not sufficiently ''aligned with'' the party, and this open-ended potential to accuse recipients of violating these regulations does not serve the Department's interest in prescribing a predictable framework under which recipients understand and comply with their legal obligations. We have revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to state: ''If a party does not have an advisor present at the hearing, the recipient must provide without fee or charge to that party an advisor of the recipient's choice, who may be, but is not required to be, an attorney, to conduct cross-examination on behalf of that party.'' This directive addresses many of the commenters' concerns about providing an advisor. By explicitly acknowledging that advisors provided by a recipient may be—but need not be—attorneys, expressly stating that the provided advisor is ''of the recipient's choice,'' and limiting the role of provided advisors to conducting cross-examination on behalf of a party, the final regulations convey the Department's intent that a recipient enjoys wide latitude to fulfill this requirement. Claims by a party, for instance, that a recipient failed to provide ''effective assistance of counsel'' would not be entertained by the Department because this provision does not require that advisors be lawyers providing legal counsel nor does this provision impose an expectation of skill, qualifications, or competence. An advisor's cross-examination ''on behalf of that party'' is satisfied where the advisor poses questions on a party's behalf, which means that an assigned advisor could relay a party's own questions to the other party or witness, and no particular skill or qualification is needed to perform that role. These changes in the final regulations similarly address commenters' concerns that the assigned advisors need be ''adverse'' to or ''pitted against'' members of the recipient's community. While an assigned advisor may have a personal or professional belief in, or dedication to, the position of the party on whose behalf the advisor conducts cross-examination, such a belief or dedication is not a requirement to function as the assigned advisor. Whether a party's cross-examination is conducted by a party's advisor of choice or by the advisor provided to that party by the recipient, the recipient itself remains neutral, including the decision-maker's obligation to serve impartially and objectively evaluate relevant evidence. The Department emphasizes that advisors of choice, and advisors provided to a party by the recipient, are not subject to the requirements of § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) which obligates Title IX personnel (Title IX Coordinators, investigators, decision-makers, and persons who facilitate informal resolutions) to serve impartially without conflicts of interest or bias for or against complainants or respondents generally, or for or against an individual complainant or respondent.

The Department understands commenters' point that educational processes have been designed to let the voices and perspectives of the parties be heard, and not the voices and perspectives of third-party advisors. For reasons described above and in § 106.45(b)(5)(iv), the Department believes that giving each party the opportunity to be assisted and supported by an advisor of choice yields important benefits to both parties participating in a grievance process. The final regulations carefully balance the right of parties to rely on and be assisted by advisors with the interest of an educational institution in focusing the institution's process on the institution's own students and employees rather than on third parties. The final regulations allow recipients to limit the active participation of advisors, with the one exception in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) that an advisor must conduct cross-examination on behalf of a party. As noted above, the Department believes that the risks of allowing personal confrontation between parties in sexual harassment cases outweigh the downsides of allowing advisors to actively participate in the limited role of conducting cross-examination.

The Department understands commenters' assertions that many recipient's employees will not wish to serve as party advisors because they do not want to be viewed as supporting or assisting one party over the other. The Department notes that § 106.45(b)(6)(i) applies only to postsecondary institutions, and institutions of higher education that receive Federal student aid under Title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965, as amended, already must comply with the Clery Act, which permits parties to have advisors of choice, and commenters have noted that many recipients' practice is to allow parties to choose advisors from among recipient employees, and that some recipients already provide advisors to parties. For the reasons explained above, these final regulations do not change that landscape qualitatively, because even conducting cross-examination ''on behalf of a party'' need not mean more than relaying that party's questions to the other parties and witnesses. That function could therefore equate to serving as a party's proxy, or advocating for a party, or neutrally relaying the party's desired questions; this provision leaves recipients and assigned advisors wide latitude in deciding how to fulfill the role of serving as an assigned advisor. For the same reason, the Department does not believe it is necessary to forbid assigned advisors from being persons who exercise any administrative or academic authority over the other party; assigned advisors are not obligated to avoid conflicts of interest and can fulfill the limited role described in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) regardless of the scope of the advisor's other duties as a recipient's employee.

For reasons described above, the Department retains the requirement for recipients to provide parties with an advisor to conduct cross-examination, instead of merely requiring recipients to advise a party about how to select an advisor. In order to foreclose personal confrontation between the parties during cross-examination while preserving the neutrality of the recipient's decision-maker, that procedure must be conducted by advisors rather than by parties, and where a party does not take the opportunity to select an advisor of the party's choice, that choice falls to the recipient. As noted above, the final regulations do not preclude a recipient from adopting and applying codes of conduct and rules of decorum to ensure that parties and advisors, including assigned advisors, conduct cross-examination questioning in a respectful and non-abusive manner, and the decision-maker remains obligated to ensure that only relevant questions are posed during cross-examination.

The Department understands commenters' desire that both parties have advisors of equal competency during a hearing. However, the Department does not wish to impose burdens and costs on recipients beyond what is necessary to achieve a Title IX grievance process with robust procedural protections leading to a reliable outcome. The Department believes that giving both parties equal opportunity to select advisors of choice, who may be, but are not required to be attorneys, and assuring parties who cannot or do not select their own advisor that the party can still accomplish cross-examination at a hearing because the recipient will provide an advisor for that limited purpose, sufficiently achieves the purpose of a Title IX grievance process without imposing additional burdens on recipients to hire attorneys for the parties. Nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient from offering to provide attorney representation or non-attorney advisors to both parties throughout the entire grievance process or just for a live hearing, though § 106.45(b)(5)(iv) ensures that parties would retain the right to select their own advisor of choice and refuse any such offer by a recipient. To allow recipients to meet their obligations with as much flexibility as possible, the Department declines to require recipients to pre-screen a panel of assigned advisors from which a party could make a selection at a hearing, or to require provided advisors to receive training from the recipient. The final regulations do not preclude a recipient from taking such steps, in the recipient's discretion, and the final regulations require decision-makers to be trained specifically in issues of relevance. The Department reiterates that a recipient may fulfill its obligation to provide an advisor for a party to conduct cross-examination at a hearing without hiring an attorney to be that party's advisor, and that remains true regardless of whether the other party has hired a lawyer as an advisor of choice. The final regulations do not create an ''arms race'' with respect to the hiring of attorneys by recipients, and recipients remain free to decide whether they wish to incur the cost or burden of providing attorneys when they must provide an advisor to a party at a hearing to conduct cross-examination. This provision does not impose an unfunded mandate on recipients because recipients retain discretion whether to incur the cost of hiring attorney or non-attorney advisors.

The Department does not believe that the final regulations' expectation for an advisor to ''conduct cross-examination on behalf of a party'' constitutes the practice of law; a Title IX adjudication is not a civil or criminal trial so the advisor is not representing a party in a court of law, and the advisor is not required to perform any function beyond relaying a party's desired questions to the other party and witnesses. However, to the extent that a recipient is concerned that State bar associations do, or may, consider party advisors at a live hearing to be practicing law, the recipient retains discretion to select attorneys as assigned party advisors. Whether attorneys become more involved in Title IX adjudications as a result is not the Department's concern; the final regulations focus on those procedural protections necessary to ensure that a Title IX grievance process is designed to reach accurate determinations.

The Department believes that § 106.45(b)(6)(i), as revised in the final regulations, addresses commenters' concerns that parties will challenge the outcome based on the recipient's choice of advisor. This provision clarifies that the choice of advisor where one must be provided by the recipient lies in the recipient's sound discretion, and removes the ''aligned with that party'' criterion so that a party cannot challenge the recipient's choice by claiming the assigned advisor was not sufficiently aligned. Whether or not the recipient complied with this provision is now more objectively determined, i.e., by observing whether the assigned advisor ''conducted cross-examination on behalf of the party'' which in essence only needs to mean relaying the party's desired questions to the other party and witnesses. The Department does not have control over claims made by parties against recipients in private litigation, but clarifies here that this provision does not impose a burden on the recipient to ensure the ''adequacy'' of an assigned advisor, merely that the assigned advisor performs the role described in this provision.

The Department disagrees that this provision exceeds the Department's statutory authority under Title IX. The Department believes this provision furthers Title IX's non-discrimination mandate by contributing to a fair grievance process leading to reliable outcomes, which is necessary in order to ensure that recipients appropriately remedy sexual harassment occurring in education programs or activities. The Department is authorized to promulgate rules and regulations to effectuate the purpose of Title IX, including regulatory requirements that do not, themselves, purport to represent a definition of discrimination. Particular requirements of a grievance process are no different in kind from the regulatory requirements the Supreme Court has expressly acknowledged fall under the Department's regulatory authority. For example, the Department's regulations have long required recipients to have grievance procedures in place even though the absence of grievance procedures does not, itself, constitute discrimination,[1320] because adopting and publishing grievance procedures for the ''prompt and equitable'' resolution of sex discrimination [1321] makes it more likely that a recipient will not engage in sex discrimination and will remedy any discrimination brought to the recipient's attention by a student or employee. Similarly, the Department has carefully considered what procedures appropriately address allegations of sex discrimination in the form of sexual harassment and has determined that the § 106.45 grievance process, including cross-examination conducted through advisors in postsecondary institutions, effectuates Title IX's non-discrimination mandate by making it less likely that a recipient will fail to accurately determine whether a student or employee has been victimized by sexual harassment and needs remedies to restore or preserve equal access to the recipient's education programs or activities.

The Department appreciates commenters' requests for clarification of this provision. Some clarification requests have been answered by the modifications made to this provision, such as removal of the ''aligned with that party'' language and specification that when a recipient must provide an advisor during a hearing the selection of that advisor is ''of the recipient's choice'' and the assigned advisor ''may be, but is not required to be, an attorney.''

As to commenters' additional questions about this provision: The assigned advisor is not required to assume the party's version of events is accurate, but the assigned advisor still must conduct cross-examination on behalf of the party. The only limitation on recipients' discretion to restrict advisors' active participation in proceedings is this provision's requirement that advisors conduct cross-examination, so recipients remain free to apply rules (equally applicable to both parties) restricting advisor participation in non-cross examination aspects of the hearing. Recipients cannot impose a cost or fee limitation on a party's advisor of choice and if required to provide a party with an advisor at a hearing, the recipient may not charge the party any fee. The final regulations require the recipient to keep confidential the identity of any individual who has made a report or complaint of sex discrimination, including any individual who has made a report or filed a formal complaint of sexual harassment, any complainant, any individual who has been reported to be the perpetrator of sex discrimination, any respondent, and any witness, except as may be permitted by the FERPA statute or regulations, 20 U.S.C. 1232g and 34 CFR part 99, or as required by law, or to carry out the purposes of 34 CFR part 106, including the conduct of any hearing. Of course, the Department of Education could enforce the requirement administratively: Agencies generally have authority to promulgate and enforce requirements that effectuate the statute's non-discrimination mandate, 20 U.S.C. 1682, even if those requirements do not purport to represent a definition of discrimination under the statute.'').

obligations may affect a recipient's ability to offer parties a recipient-provided advisor to conduct cross-examination in addition to allowing the parties' advisors of choice to appear at the hearing. The final regulations do not preclude recipients from adopting a rule that requires parties to inform the recipient in advance of a hearing whether the party intends to bring an advisor of choice to the hearing; but if a party then appears at a hearing without an advisor the recipient would need to stop the hearing as necessary to permit the recipient to assign an advisor to that party to conduct cross-examination. A party cannot ''fire'' an assigned advisor during the hearing, but if the party correctly asserts that the assigned advisor is refusing to ''conduct cross-examination on the party's behalf'' then the recipient is obligated to provide the party an advisor to perform that function, whether that means counseling the assigned advisor to perform that role, or stopping the hearing to assign a different advisor. If a party to whom the recipient assigns an advisor refuses to work with the advisor when the advisor is willing to conduct cross-examination on the party's behalf, then for reasons described above that party has no right of self-representation with respect to conducting cross-examination, and that party would not be able to pose any cross-examination questions. Whether advisors also may conduct direct examination is left to a recipient's discretion (though any rule in this regard must apply equally to both parties). This provision applies to parties who are a recipient's employees, including at-will employees; recipients may not impose training or competency assessments on advisors of choice selected by parties, but nothing in the final regulations prevents a recipient from training and assessing the competency of its own employees whom the recipient may desire to appoint as party advisors.

The Department declines to require training for assigned advisors because the goal of this provision is not to make parties ''feel adequately represented'' but rather to ensure that the parties have the opportunity for their own view of the case to be probed in front of the decision-maker. Whether a party views an advisor of choice as ''representing'' the party during a live hearing or not, this provision only requires recipients to permit advisor participation on the party's behalf to conduct cross-examination; not to ''represent'' the party at the live hearing. A recipient may, but is not required to, allow advisors to ''represent'' parties during the entire live hearing (or, for that matter, throughout the entire grievance process).[1322]

The Department notes that nothing in these final regulations infringes on a recipient's ability to enforce its own codes of conduct with respect to conduct other than Title IX sexual harassment, and thus if a party or advisor ''breaks a recipients' rules'' during a hearing the recipient retains authority to respond in accordance with its codes of conduct, so long as the recipient is also complying with all obligations under § 106.45. If a party's advisor of choice refuses to comply with a recipient's rules of decorum (for example, by insisting on yelling at the other party), the recipient may provide that party with an advisor to conduct cross-examination on behalf of that party. If a provided advisor refuses to comply with a recipient's rules of decorum, the recipient may provide that party with a different advisor to conduct cross-examination on behalf of that party. The Department also notes that § 106.71 protects participants in a Title IX grievance process against retaliation so an action taken against any participant in a hearing may not be taken for the purpose of interfering with any right or privilege secured by Title IX or because the individual has participated in any manner in a hearing.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to remove the phrase ''aligned with that party'' and clarify that if a party does not have an advisor present at the live hearing, the recipient must provide without fee or charge to that party an advisor of the recipient's choice, who may be, but is not required to be, an attorney, to conduct cross-examination on behalf of that party.

We have also added § 106.71, prohibiting retaliation and providing in pertinent part that no recipient or other person may intimidate, threaten, coerce, or discriminate against any individual for the purpose of interfering with any right or privilege secured by Title IX or because the individual has made a report or complaint, testified, assisted, or participated or refused to participate in any manner in an investigation, proceeding, or hearing; and the recipient must keep confidential the identity of any individual who has made a report or complaint of sex discrimination, including any individual who has made a report or filed a formal complaint of sexual harassment, any complainant, any individual who has been reported to be the perpetrator of sex discrimination, any respondent, and any witness, except as required by the FERPA statute or regulations, 20 U.S.C. 1232g and 34 CFR part 99, or as required by law, or to carry out the purposes of 34 CFR part 106, including the conduct of any investigation or hearing.

[1322] Section 106.45(b)(5)(iv).

Explain Decision To Exclude Questions

Comments: Some commenters supported the requirement in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) that decision-makers explain to the party's advisor posing a question any decision to exclude a question as not relevant. Commenters asserted that they have observed Title IX proceedings in which recipients refused to allow a party's questions to be asked of the opposing party with no explanation as to how or why the question was not relevant to the allegations. Commenters asserted that this requirement may reveal and prevent bias in proceedings by making the decision-maker explain the rationale for deciding that a question is not relevant.

Other commenters opposed the requirement that decision-makers explain any reason for excluding a question as not relevant, arguing that decision-makers are usually not lawyers or judges and are not legally trained to make complex rulings, so that requiring on-the-spot decisions about relevance will expose recipients to legal liability. Commenters argued that this provision exceeds procedural norms in criminal courts where rules of procedure do not demand that judges provide explanation for rulings. Commenters argued that parties should have the right to appeal wrongful decisions to exclude evidence and thus it is unnecessary to require decision-makers to explain exclusion decisions during the hearing. Commenters wondered whether the parties are allowed to argue with the decision-maker upon hearing a decision-maker's explanation about the relevance of a question and expressed concern that protracted arguments over relevance would lengthen hearings and feel tortuous for students. Commenters expressed concern that the requirement to explain irrelevancy decisions will disincentivize decision-makers from properly excluding questions that violate the rape shield protections.

Commenters proposed that the provision be modified to require decision-makers to explain the decision to exclude questions in writing after the hearing rather than during the hearing. Commenters suggested that the final regulations also give decision-makers the right to screen questions before the hearing so the decision-maker has adequate time to consider whether the questions are relevant. Commenters wondered what type of information a decision-maker is required to give to meet this provision. Commenters argued this provision is meaningless because if a decision-maker decides a question is irrelevant, presumably the decision-maker believes the question does not tend to prove the matter at issue and thus, telling the decision-maker to state self-evidently during the hearing: ''This question is not relevant because it is not relevant'' adds no value to the proceeding and only allows party advisors to bog down the hearing by demanding that rote explanation.

Discussion: The Department agrees with commenters that a decision-maker's refusal to explain why questions are excluded has caused problems with the accuracy and perception of legitimacy of recipients' Title IX proceedings and thus believes that this provision reasonably prevents those problems and helps ensure that decision-makers are making relevance determinations without bias for or against complainants or respondents.

The Department disagrees that this provision requires legal expertise on the part of a decision-maker. One of the benefits to the final regulations' refusal to import wholesale any set of rules of evidence is that the legal sophistication required to navigate rules of evidence results often from determining the scope of exceptions to admissibility rules. By contrast, the decision-maker's only evidentiary threshold for admissibility or exclusion of questions and evidence is whether the question or evidence is relevant—not whether it would then still be excluded under the myriad of other evidentiary rules and exceptions that apply under, for example, the Federal Rules of Evidence. While this provision does require ''on the spot'' determinations about a question's relevance, the decision-maker must be trained in how to conduct a grievance process, specifically including how to determine relevance within the scope of this provision's rape shield language and the final regulations' protection of privileged information and parties' treatment records. Contrary to some commenters' assertions, judges in civil and criminal trials often do make ''on the spot'' relevance determinations, and while this provision requires the decision-maker to ''explain'' the decision in a way that rules of procedure do not require of judges, the Department believes that this provision will aid parties in having confidence that Title IX decision-makers are appropriately considering all relevant evidence. The final regulations contemplate that decision-makers often will be laypersons, not judges or lawyers. A judge's relevance ruling from the bench needs no in-the-moment explanation because a judge has the legal sophistication to have reached a ruling against the backdrop of the judge's legal knowledge. By contrast, a layperson's determination that a question is not relevant is made by applying logic and common sense, but not against a backdrop of legal expertise. Thus, an explanation of how or why the question was irrelevant to the allegations at issue, or is deemed irrelevant by these final regulations (for example, in the case of sexual predisposition or prior sexual behavior information) provides transparency for the parties to understand a decision-maker's relevance determinations.

Commenters correctly note that parties may appeal erroneous relevance determinations, if they affected the outcome, because § 106.45(b)(8) allows the parties equal appeal rights on grounds that include procedural irregularity that affected the outcome. However, asking the decision-maker to also explain the exclusion of questions during the hearing does not affect the parties' appeal rights and may reduce the number of instances in which a party feels the need to appeal on this basis because the decision-maker will have explained the decision during the hearing. The final regulations do not preclude a recipient from adopting a rule (applied equally to both parties) that does, or does not, give parties or advisors the right to discuss the relevance determination with the decision-maker during the hearing. If a recipient believes that arguments about a relevance determination during a hearing would unnecessarily protract the hearing or become uncomfortable for parties, the recipient may adopt a rule that prevents parties and advisors from challenging the relevance determination (after receiving the decision-maker's explanation) during the hearing.

The Department does not believe this requirement will negatively affect a decision-maker's incentive to properly exclude questions under this provision's rape shield protections. The decision-maker is under an obligation to exclude such questions and evidence, and to only evaluate relevant evidence in reaching a determination. Requiring the decision-maker to explain relevance decisions during the hearing only reinforces the decision-maker's responsibility to accurately determine relevance, including the irrelevance of information barred under the rape shield language. Further, we have revised § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to require decision-makers (and investigators) to be trained in issues of relevance, including how to apply the rape shield protections in these final regulations.

Requiring the decision-maker to explain decisions about irrelevance also helps reinforce the provision in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) that a decision-maker must not have a bias for or against complaints or respondents generally or an individual complainant or respondent. Providing a reason for the decision reveals whether the decision-maker is maintaining a neutral, objective position throughout the hearing. The explanation for the decision may reveal any bias for a particular complainant or respondent or a bias for or against complainants or respondents generally.

The Department declines to change § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to require after-hearing explanation of relevance determinations, but nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient from adopting a rule that the decision-maker will, for example, send to the parties after the hearing any revisions to the decision-maker's explanation that was provided during the hearing. In order to preserve the benefits of live, back-and-forth questioning and follow-up questioning unique to cross-examination, the Department declines to impose a requirement that questions be submitted for screening prior to the hearing (or during the hearing); the final regulations revise this provision to clarify that cross-examination must occur ''directly, orally, and in real time'' during the live hearing, balanced by the express provision that questions asked of parties and witnesses must be relevant, and before a party or witness answers a cross-examination question the decision-maker must determine relevance (and explain a determination of irrelevance).

This provision does not require a decision-maker to give a lengthy or complicated explanation; it is sufficient, for example, for a decision-maker to explain that a question is irrelevant because the question calls for prior sexual behavior information without meeting one of the two exceptions, or because the question asks about a detail that is not probative of any material fact concerning the allegations. No lengthy or complicated exposition is required to satisfy this provision. Accordingly, the Department does not believe this requirement will ''bog down'' the hearing. We have revised this provision by moving the requirement for the decision-maker to explain determinations of irrelevance to be combined with a sentence that did not appear in the NPRM, instructing the decision-maker to determine the relevance of a cross-examination question before the party or witness answers the question and to explain any decision to exclude a question as not relevant.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to add the phrase ''directly, orally, and in real time'' to describe how cross-examination must be conducted, thereby precluding a requirement that questions be submitted or screened prior to the live hearing. We have further revised this provision by moving the requirement for the decision-maker to explain determinations of irrelevance to be combined with a sentence that did not appear in the NPRM, instructing the decision-maker to determine the relevance of a cross-examination or other question before the party or witness answers the question and to explain any decision to exclude a question as not relevant. We have also revised § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to require training for decision-makers on issues of relevance, including application of the rape shield protections in § 106.45(b)(6).

No Reliance on Statements of a Party Who Does Not Submit to Cross-Examination

Comments: Some commenters supported the provision in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) prohibiting a decision-maker from relying on statements made by a party or witness who does not submit to cross-examination in a postsecondary institution live hearing, because this requirement ensures that only statements that have been tested for credibility, in the ''crucible'' of cross-examination, will be considered. Commenters asserted that Title IX sexual misconduct cases often concern accusations of a ''he said/she said'' nature where accounts differ between complainant and respondent and corroborating evidence is inconclusive or non-existent, thus making cross-examined party statements critical to reaching a fair determination.

Other commenters supported this provision but argued that one exception should apply: Statements against a party's own interest should remain admissible even where the party refuses to appear or testify. Commenters argued that without this change, this provision incentivizes respondents who have already been convicted criminally not to appear for hearings because the respondent's absence would ensure that any admission, such as part of a plea bargain, could not be considered.

Other commenters opposed the provision that a decision-maker cannot rely on statements of a party or witness who does not submit to cross-examination. Some commenters argued that if a party refuses to submit to cross-examination, the consequence should be dismissal of the proceeding, not exclusion of the refusing party's statements.[1323]

Commenters argued that a respondent may refuse to submit to cross-examination in a Title IX hearing when criminal charges are also pending against the respondent due to concerns about self-incrimination and that this provision should prevent a decision-maker from drawing any adverse inferences against a respondent based on a respondent's refusal to submit to cross-examination because a decision by an accused not to testify has no probative value and is irrelevant to the issue of culpability. Commenters expressed concern that public institutions could be opened up to legal challenges alleging violation of respondents' Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination because where a respondent answered some questions, but refused to answer other questions due to refusal to self-incriminate, the proposed rules would demand exclusion of all the respondent's statements, even as to the information about which the respondent was subjected to cross-examination. Commenters argued this provision is unfair to respondents because a respondent may not want to appear for a Title IX hearing for fear that oral testimony could be admitted in a future criminal or civil proceeding, yet § 106.45(b)(6)(i) will ''all but require'' the adjudicator to make a finding of responsibility against the respondent if the reporting party testifies, is cross-examined, and is credible. Other commenters argued that it is unfair that a complainant's entire statement would be excluded where a respondent refused to appear and thus the complainant could not be cross-examined by the respondent's advisor.

Commenters argued that this provision makes cross-examination mandatory and forces survivors into a Hobson's choice by requiring the decision-maker to disregard the statement of a complainant who does not agree to be cross-examined. Commenters argued that it is unfair to exclude a complainant's statements from consideration when often a complainant will not wish to submit to cross-examination due to fear of retaliation by a respondent, or chooses not to participate in a grievance process initiated against the complainant's wishes (such as where the Title IX Coordinator signs a formal complaint). Commenters argued that this provision requires exclusion of a complainant's statements even where the complainant's absence from a hearing is because the respondent wrongfully procured the complainant's absence, in contravention of the doctrine of forfeiture by wrongdoing.[1324]

Commenters argued that in criminal cases, the right to cross-examine the prosecution's hearsay declarants only extends to declarants who, at the time of their statement, understood they were giving evidence likely to be used in a later prosecution, and the proposed regulations thus inappropriately exclude a common category of statements gathered in Title IX investigations: Statements to friends and family who are consoling a victim and are not aware that any crime is under investigation.[1325] Commenters argued that excluding a complainant's statement, including the initial formal complaint, just because a survivor does not want to undergo cross-examination is prejudicial and not a trauma-informed practice, when even reporting sexual misconduct requires bravery. Commenters argued that this provision is punitive when survivors are already required to participate in an investigation that can last for months. Commenters argued it is unfair to punish a survivor by denying relief for a meritorious claim just because key witnesses refuse to testify or refuse to submit to cross-examination.

Commenters argued that this provision may make it difficult for schools to address situations where they know of predators operating on their campuses, as victim after victim declines to participate in cross-examination, potentially creating incentives for schools to coerce unwilling victims into participating in traumatizing processes, leading to further breakdown in trust between students and their institutions.

Yet, the [recipient] resolved this problem of credibility without assessing Roe's credibility. In fact, it decided plaintiff's fate without seeing or hearing from Roe at all. That is disturbing and, in this case, a denial of due process.'') (internal quotation marks and citations omitted).

[1325] Commenters cited: Crawford v. Washington, 541 U.S. 36 (2004).

Commenters argued that the statements of witnesses should not be excluded due to non-appearance or refusal to submit to cross-examination, because witnesses may be unavailable for legitimate reasons such as studying abroad, illness, graduation, out-of-state residency, class activities, and so forth. Some commenters suggested that for witnesses (but not parties) written statements or telephonic testimony should be sufficient.

Commenters argued that parties and witnesses may be unavailable for a hearing for a variety of reasons unrelated to the reliability of their statements, including death, or disability that occurs after an investigation has begun but before the hearing occurs.

Commenters argued that the Federal Rules of Evidence [1326] allow out-of-court statements to be admitted in certain circumstances and for limited purposes, while § 106.45(b)(6)(i) creates a ''draconian'' rule that excludes even relevant, reliable statements, a result that is particularly unfair in light of the fact that recipients do not have subpoena powers to compel parties and witnesses to attend hearings. Commenters argued that courts do not impose cross-examination as a due process requirement where the legislature has not granted subpoena power to an administrative body because to do so would allow the administrative body to act in a manner contrary to its enabling statute, and public universities do not have subpoena power; thus, commenters argued, the university cannot be foreclosed from relying on hearsay testimony of absent witnesses.[1327] Commenters argued that this provision should be modified so that a recipient may consider all information presented during the investigation and hearing regardless of who appears at the hearing, so that videos, texts, and statements are all evaluated on their own merits. Commenters argued that this provision creates a blanket exclusion of hearsay evidence, yet the Supreme Court has never announced a ''blanket rejection . . . of administrative reliance on hearsay irrespective of reliability and probative value'' and hearsay evidence may constitute substantial evidence supporting an administrative finding.[1328]

Commenters suggested that this provision be modified so that the consequence of a party failing to appear or answer questions is a change of the standard of evidence, not exclusion of the party's statements, so that if a complainant refuses to testify, the standard of evidence is increased to the clear and convincing evidence standard, while if the respondent refuses to testify, the standard of evidence is decreased to the preponderance of the evidence standard.

Commenters requested clarification that where a respondent fails to appear for a hearing, the recipient may still enter a default finding against the respondent and implement protective measures for the complainant.

Commenters argued that the final regulations should allow for evidence not subject to cross-examination (''uncrossed'') to be taken into account ''for what it's worth'' by the decision-maker who may assign appropriate weight to uncrossed statements rather than disregarding them altogether, so as to provide more due process and fundamental fairness to both parties in the search for truth.

Commenters asked for clarification of a number of questions including: Does this provision exclude only statements made during the hearing or to all of a party's statements even those made during the investigation, or prior to a formal complaint being filed? What is the threshold for not submitting to cross-examination (e.g., if a party answers by saying ''I don't want to answer that'' or answers several questions but refuses to answer one particular question, has the party ''submitted to cross-examination'' or not, and does the reason for refusing to answer matter, for instance where a respondent refuses to answer due to self-incrimination concerns, or a complainant refuses to answer due to good faith belief that the question violates rape shield protections and disagrees with the decision-maker's decision to the contrary)? Does exclusion of ''any statement'' include, for example, text messages or email sent by the party especially where one party submitted to cross-examination and the other did not, but the text message exchange was between the two parties? Are decision-makers able to consider information provided in documents during the investigation stage (e.g., police reports, SANE (sexual assault nurse examiner) reports etc.), if certain witnesses referenced in those documents (e.g., police officers and SANE nurses) do not submit to cross-examination or refuse to answer a specific question during cross-examination? If a party or witness refuses to answer a question posed by the decision-maker (not by a party advisor) must the decision-maker exclude the party's statements? Commenters suggested making this provision more precise by replacing ''does not submit to cross-examination'' with ''does not appear for cross-examination.'' Commenters asserted that parties should have the right to ''waive a question'' without the party's entire statement being disregarded.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support for this provision in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) and agrees that it ensures that in the postsecondary context, only statements that have been tested for credibility will be considered by the decision-maker in reaching a determination regarding responsibility. Where a Title IX sexual harassment allegation does not turn on the credibility of the parties or witnesses, this provision allows the other evidence to be considered even though a party's statements are not relied on due to the party's or witness's non-appearance or refusal to submit to cross-examination. The Department declines to add exceptions to this provision, such as permitting reliance on statements against a party's interest. Determining whether a statement is against a party's interest, and applying the conditions and exceptions that apply in evidentiary codes that utilize such a rule,[1329] would risk complicating a fact-finding process so that a non-attorney decision-maker—even when given training in how to impartially conduct a grievance process—may not be equipped to conduct the adjudication.

The Department declines to change this provision so the consequence of refusal to submit to cross-examination is dismissal of the case rather than non-reliance on the refusing party or witness's statement. Such a change would operate only against complainants' interests because a respondent could choose to refuse cross-examination knowing the result would be dismissal (which, presumably, is a positive result in a respondent's view). This would essentially give respondents the ability to control the outcome of the hearing, running contrary to the purpose of the final regulations in giving both parties equal opportunity to meaningfully be heard before an impartial decision-maker reaches a determination regarding responsibility.

As commenters acknowledged, not all Title IX sexual harassment allegations rely on party testimony; for example, in some situations video evidence of the underlying incident is available, and in such circumstances even if both parties fail to appear or submit to cross-examination the decision-maker would disregard party statements yet proceed to evaluate remaining evidence, including video evidence that does not constitute statements or to the extent that the video contains non-statement evidence. If a party or witness makes a statement in the video, then the decision-maker may not rely on the statement of that party or witness in reaching a determination regarding responsibility. The Department understands commenters' arguments that courts have noted the unfairness of reaching a determination without ever probing or testing the credibility of the complainant.[1330] But § 106.45(b)(6)(i) does not raise such unfairness, because the central unfairness is where a decision-maker ''resolved this problem of credibility'' in favor of the party whose statements remained untested. The nature of such unfairness is not present under the final regulations where, if a party does not appear or submit to cross-examination the party's statement cannot be relied on—this provision does not allow a decision-maker to ''resolve'' credibility in favor of a party whose statements remain untested through cross-examination.

The Department understands commenters concerns that respondents, complainants, and witnesses may be absent from a hearing, or may refuse to submit to cross-examination, for a variety of reasons, including a respondent's self-incrimination concerns regarding a related criminal proceeding, a complainant's reluctance to be cross-examined, or a witness studying abroad, among many other reasons. In response to commenters' concerns, the Department has revised the proposed regulations as follows: (1) We have revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to state that where a decision-maker must not rely on an absent or non-cross examined party or witness's statements, the decision-maker cannot draw any inferences about the determination regarding responsibility based on such absence or refusal to be cross-examined; (2) We have revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to grant a recipient discretion to hold the entire hearing virtually using technology that enables any or all participants to appear remotely; (3) § 106.71 expressly prohibits retaliation against any party, witness, or other person exercising rights under Title IX, including the right to participate or refuse to participate in a grievance process; (4) § 106.45(b)(3)(ii) grants a recipient discretion to dismiss a formal complaint, or allegations therein, where the complainant notifies the Title IX Coordinator in writing that the complainants wishes to withdraw the allegations, or the respondent is no longer enrolled or employed by the recipient, or specific circumstances prevent the recipient from gathering evidence sufficient to reach a determination. These changes address many of the concerns raised by commenters stemming from reasons why parties or witnesses may not wish to participate and the consequences of non-participation.

It is possible that one party's refusal to submit to cross-examination could result in the other party's statements remaining under consideration by the decision-maker even though the refusing party's statements are excluded (e.g., where one party refuses to submit to cross-examination, yet that party's advisor cross-examines the opposing party, whose statements are then considered by the decision-maker), but the opportunity of the refusing party to conduct cross-examination of the opposing party ensures that the opposing party's statements are not considered unless they have been tested via cross-examination. Because the final regulations preclude a decision-maker from drawing any inferences about the determination regarding responsibility based solely on a party's refusal to be cross-examined, the adjudication can still yield a fair, reliable outcome even where, for example, the refusing party is a respondent exercising a Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

Where one party appears at the hearing and the other party does not, § 106.45(b)(6)(i) still states: ''If a party does not have an advisor present at the hearing, the recipient must provide without fee or charge to that party an advisor of the recipient's choice, who may be, but is not required to be, an attorney, to conduct cross-examination on behalf of that party.'' Thus, a party's advisor may appear and conduct cross-examination even when the party whom they are advising does not appear. Similarly, where one party does not appear and that party's advisor of choice does not appear, a recipient-provided advisor must still cross-examine the other, appearing party ''on behalf of'' the non-appearing party, resulting in consideration of the appearing party's statements but not the non-appearing party's statements (without any inference being drawn based on the non-appearance). Because the statements of the appearing party were tested via cross-examination, a fair, reliable outcome can result in such a situation.

The Department disagrees that this provision leaves complainants (or respondents) in a Hobson's choice. The final regulations address a complainant's fear of retaliation, the inconvenience of appearing at a hearing, and the emotional trauma of personal confrontation between the parties. Further, as noted above, if a complainant still does not wish to appear or be cross-examined, an appointed advisor may conduct cross-examination of the respondent (if the respondent does appear) so that a decision-maker only considers the respondent's statements if the statements have been tested for credibility. Where a grievance process is initiated because the Title IX Coordinator, and not the complainant, signed the formal complaint, the complainant who did not wish to initiate a grievance process remains under no obligation to then participate in the grievance process, and the Department does not believe that exclusion of the complainant's statements in such a scenario is unfair to the complainant, who did not wish to file a formal complaint in the first place yet remains eligible to receive supportive measures protecting the complainant's equal access to education. If the respondent ''wrongfully procures'' a complainant's absence, for example, through intimidation or threats of violence, and the recipient has notice of that misconduct by the respondent (which likely constitutes prohibited retaliation), the recipient must remedy the retaliation, perhaps by rescheduling the hearing to occur at a later time when the complainant may appear with safety measures in place.

The Department disagrees that this provision needs to be modified so that a party's statements to family or friends would still be relied upon even when the party does not submit to cross-examination. Even if the family member or friend did appear and submit to cross-examination, where the family member's or friend's testimony consists of recounting the statement of the party, and where the party does not submit to cross-examination, it would be unfair and potentially lead to an erroneous outcome to rely on statements untested via cross-examination.[1331] Further, such a modification would likely operate to incentivize parties to avoid submitting to cross-examination if a family member or friend could essentially testify by recounting the party's own statements. The Department understands that courts of law operate under comprehensive, complex rules of evidence under the auspices of judges legally trained to apply those rules of evidence (which often intersect with other procedural and substantive legal rules, such as rules of procedure, and constitutional rights). Such comprehensive rules of evidence admit hearsay (generally, out-of-court statements offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted) under certain conditions, which differ in criminal and civil trials. Because Title IX grievance processes are not court proceedings, comprehensive rules of evidence do not, and need not, apply. Rather, the Department has prescribed procedures designed to achieve a fair, reliable outcome in the context of sexual harassment in an education program or activity where the conduct alleged constitutes sex discrimination under Title IX. While judges in courts of law are competent to apply comprehensive, complicated rules of evidence, the Department does not believe that expectation is fair to impose on recipients, whose primary function is to provide education, not to resolve disputes between students and employees.

Absent importing comprehensive rules of evidence, the alternative is to apply a bright-line rule that instructs a decision-maker to either consider, or not consider, statements made by a person who does not submit to cross-examination. The Department believes that in the context of sexual harassment allegations under Title IX, a rule of non-reliance on untested statements is more likely to lead to reliable outcomes than a rule of reliance on untested statements. If statements untested by cross-examination may still be considered and relied on, the benefits of cross-examination as a truth-seeking device will largely be lost in the Title IX grievance process. Thus, the Department declines to import a rule of evidence that, for example, allows a witness's statement to be relied on where the statement was made to friends or family without awareness that a crime was under investigation.

The Department notes that the Supreme Court case cited to by some commenters urging a rule that would essentially allow non-testimonial statements to be considered without having been tested by cross-examination, analyzed a judicially-implied hearsay exception in light of the constitutional (Sixth Amendment's Confrontation Clause) right of a criminal defendant to confront witnesses; the Court reasoned that the plain language of the Confrontation Clause refers to ''witnesses,'' that the dictionary definition of a witness is one who ''bears testimony'' and thus the Confrontation Clause generally does not allow testimonial statements—such as formal statements, solemn declarations, or affirmations, intended to prove or establish a fact—to be used against a criminal defendant unless such statements are made by a person subject to cross-examination in court, or where the defendant had a previous opportunity to cross-examine the person making the statement.[1332] The Court reasoned that hearsay exceptions as applied to non-testimonial statements, such as business records, did not raise the core concern of the Confrontation Clause and, thus, rules of evidence permitting admission of non-testimonial statements under specific hearsay exceptions did not raise constitutional problems.[1333] While commenters correctly observe that the Confrontation Clause is concerned with use of testimonial statements against criminal defendants, even if use of a non-testimonial statement poses no constitutional problem under the Sixth Amendment, the statement would still need to meet a hearsay exception under applicable rules of evidence in a criminal court. For reasons discussed above, the Department does not wish to impose a complex set of evidentiary rules on recipients, whether patterned after civil or criminal rules. Even though a party's statements that are not subject to cross-examination might be admissible in a civil or criminal trial under rules of evidence that apply in those contexts, the Department has determined that such untested statements, whether testimonial or non-testimonial, should not be relied on in a Title IX grievance process. Reliance on party and witness statements that have not been tested for credibility via cross-examination undermines party and public confidence in the fairness and accuracy of the determinations reached by postsecondary institutions. This provision need not result in failure to consider relevant evidence because parties and witnesses retain the opportunity to have their own statements considered, by submitting to cross-examination.

In cases where a complainant files a formal complaint, and then does not appear or refuses to be cross-examined at the hearing, this provision excludes the complainant's statements, including allegations in a formal complaint. The Department does not believe this is prejudicial or punitive against a complainant because the final regulations provide complainants with opportunities to submit to cross-examination and thus have their statements considered, in ways that lessen the inconvenience and potential trauma of such a procedure. Complainants may request (and the recipient must grant the request) for the live hearing to be held with the parties in separate rooms so as not to come face to face with the respondent; questioning cannot be conducted by the respondent personally; the recipient may allow parties to appear virtually for the live hearing; complainants have the right to an advisor of choice to support and assist the party throughout the grievance process; and recipients may establish rules of decorum to ensure questioning is conducted in a respectful manner. Further, recipients must offer supportive measures to a complainant which may, for example, forbid contact or communication between the parties. The Department believes that without the credibility-testing function of cross-examination, whether the complainant's claim is meritorious cannot be ascertained with sufficient assurance. The Department understands that complainants (and respondents) often will not have control over whether witnesses appear and are cross-examined, because neither the recipient nor the parties have subpoena power to compel appearance of witnesses. Some absences of witnesses can be avoided by a recipient thoughtfully working with witnesses regarding scheduling of a hearing, and taking advantage of the discretion to permit witnesses to testify remotely. Where a witness cannot or will not appear and be cross-examined, that person's statements will not be relied on by the decision-maker, but the Department believes that any determination reached under this provision will be more reliable than a determination reached based on statements that have not been tested for credibility.

The Department notes that the final regulations expressly allow a recipient to remove a respondent on an emergency basis and do not prescribe cross-examination as a necessary procedure during the post-removal opportunity to challenge the removal.[1334] Recipients may also implement supportive measures that restrict students' or employees' contact or communication with others. Recipients thus have avenues for addressing serial predator situations even where no victim chooses to participate in a grievance process. A recipient is prohibited from coercing unwilling victims to participate in a grievance process,[1335] even where the recipient's goal is to investigate a possible predator on campus.

The final regulations grant recipients discretion to allow participants, including witnesses, to appear at a live hearing virtually; however, technology must enable all participants to see and hear other participants, so a telephonic appearance would not be sufficient to comply with § 106.45(b)(6)(i). For reasons discussed above, written statements cannot be relied upon unless the witness submits to cross-examination, and whether a witness's statement is reliable must be determined in light of the credibility-testing function of cross-examination, even where non-appearance is due to death or post-investigation disability. The Department notes that recipients have discretion to apply limited extensions of time frames during the grievance process for good cause, which may include, for example, a temporary postponement of a hearing to accommodate a disability.

The Department understands commenters' concerns that a blanket rule against reliance on party and witness statements made by a person who does not submit to cross-examination is a broader exclusionary rule than found in the Federal Rules of Evidence, under which certain hearsay exceptions permit consideration of statements made by persons who do not testify in court and have not been cross-examined. The Department understands that postsecondary institutions lack subpoena power to compel parties or witnesses to appear and testify at a live hearing. The final regulations do not purport to grant recipients the authority to compel appearance and testimony. However, where a party or witness does not appear and is not cross-examined, the statements of that party or witness cannot be determined reliable, truthful, or credible in a non-courtroom setting like that of an educational institution's proceeding that lacks subpoena powers, comprehensive rules of evidence, and legal professionals. As many commenters noted, recipients are educational institutions that should not be converted into de facto courtrooms. The final regulations thus prescribe a process that simplifies evidentiary complexities while ensuring that determinations regarding responsibility result from consideration of relevant, reliable evidence. The Department declines to adopt commenters' suggestion that instead the decision-maker should be permitted to rely on statements that are not subject to cross-examination, if they are reliable; making such a determination without the benefit of extensive rules of evidence would likely result in inconsistent and potentially inaccurate assessments of reliability. Commenters correctly note that courts have not imposed a blanket rule excluding hearsay evidence from use in administrative proceedings. However, cases cited by commenters do not stand for the proposition that every administrative proceeding must be permitted to rely on hearsay evidence, even where the agency lacks subpoena power to compel witnesses to appear.[1336]

The Department acknowledges that the evidence gathered during an investigation may be broader than what is ultimately deemed relevant and relied upon in making a determination regarding responsibility, but the procedures in § 106.45 are deliberately selected to ensure that all evidence directly related to the allegations is reviewed and inspected by the parties, that the investigative report summarizes only relevant evidence, and that the determination regarding responsibility relies on relevant evidence. Because party and witness statements so often raise credibility questions in the context of sexual harassment allegations, the decision-maker must consider only those statements that have benefited from the truth-seeking function of cross-examination. The recipient, and the parties, have equal opportunity (and, for the recipient, the obligation) to gather and present relevant evidence including fact and expert witnesses, and face the same limitations inherent in a lack of subpoena power to compel witness testimony. The Department believes that the final regulations, including § 106.45(b)(6)(i), strike the appropriate balance for a postsecondary institution context between ensuring that only relevant and reliable evidence is considered while not over-legalizing the grievance process.

The Department declines to tie reliance on statements that are not subject to cross-examination to the standard of evidence used. For reasons discussed in the ''Section 106.45(b)(7)(i) Standard of Evidence and Directed Question 6'' subsection of the ''Determinations Regarding Responsibility'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble, the Department believes that it is appropriate to leave recipients flexibility to choose between two standards of evidence but has made [1335] Section 106.71 provides: ''No recipient or other person may intimidate, threaten, coerce, or discriminate against any individual for the purpose of interfering with any right or privilege secured by title IX or this part, or because the individual has made a report or complaint, testified, assisted, or participated or refused to participate in any manner in an investigation, proceeding, or hearing under this part.'' (emphasis added).

[1336] E.g., Johnson v. United States, 628 F.2d 187, 190–91 (D.C. Cir. 1980) (holding that substantial evidence supported U.S. Civil Service Commission's termination determination even though it relied on hearsay statements of three witnesses, where the agency's procedural rules expressly allowed introduction of witness statements and the statements were found to be reliable because they were from disinterested witnesses, consistent with each other, and the defense had seen the witness statements prior to the hearing); Richardson v. Perales, 402 U.S. 389, 407, 410 (1971) (Social Security Administration hearing regarding disability benefits eligibility did not deprive claimant of due process by relying on written medical consultant reports, where those written reports were relevant and the claimant could have compelled the doctors to appear for cross-examination but did not do so).

changes in the final regulations to clarify that a recipient's choice must then apply to all formal complaints of sexual harassment subject to a § 106.45 grievance process. Making the standard of evidence dependent on whether a decision-maker relies on party or witness statements that are not subject to cross-examination would effectively remove a recipient's discretion to select a standard of evidence, and would not achieve the benefits of a recipient implementing a predictable grievance process.

The Department appreciates commenters' requests for clarification of this provision. As noted above, even where a respondent fails to appear for a hearing, the decision-maker may still consider the relevant evidence (excluding statements of the non-appearing party) and reach a determination regarding responsibility, though the final regulations do not refer to this as a ''default judgment.'' If a decision-maker does proceed to reach a determination, no inferences about the determination regarding responsibility may be drawn based on the non-appearance of a party. The Department notes that under § 106.45(b)(3)(ii) a recipient may in its discretion, but is not required to, dismiss a formal complaint where the respondent is no longer enrolled or employed by the recipient or where specific circumstances prevent the recipient from gathering evidence sufficient to reach a determination regarding responsibility (or where a complainant informs the Title IX Coordinator in writing that the complainant wishes to withdraw the formal complaint).

The prohibition on reliance on ''statements'' applies not only to statements made during the hearing, but also to any statement of the party or witness who does not submit to cross-examination. ''Statements'' has its ordinary meaning, but would not include evidence (such as videos) that do not constitute a person's intent to make factual assertions, or to the extent that such evidence does not contain a person's statements. Thus, police reports, SANE reports, medical reports, and other documents and records may not be relied on to the extent that they contain the statements of a party or witness who has not submitted to cross-examination. While documentary evidence such as police reports or hospital records may have been gathered during investigation [1337] and, if directly related to the allegations inspected and reviewed by the parties,[1338] and to the extent they are relevant, summarized in the investigative report,[1339] the hearing is the parties' first opportunity to argue to the decision-maker about the credibility and implications of such evidence. Probing the credibility and reliability of statements asserted by witnesses contained in such evidence requires the parties to have the opportunity to cross-examine the witnesses making the statements.

The Department appreciates the opportunity to clarify here that to ''submit to cross-examination'' means answering those cross-examination questions that are relevant; the decision-maker is required to make relevance determinations regarding cross-examination in real time during the hearing in part to ensure that parties and witnesses do not feel compelled to answer irrelevant questions for fear of their statements being excluded. If a party or witness disagrees with a decision-maker's determination that a question is relevant, during the hearing, the party or witness's choice is to abide by the decision-maker's determination and answer, or refuse to answer the question, but unless the decision-maker reconsiders the relevance determination prior to reaching the determination regarding responsibility, the decision-maker would not rely on the witness's statements.[1340] The party or witness's reason for refusing to answer a relevant question does not matter. This provision does apply to the situation where evidence involves intertwined statements of both parties (e.g., a text message exchange or email thread) and one party refuses to submit to cross-examination and the other does submit, so that the statements of one party cannot be relied on but statements of the other party may be relied on. If parties do not testify about their own statement and submit to cross-examination, the decision-maker will not have the appropriate context for the statement, which is why the decision-maker cannot consider that party's statements. This provision requires a party or witness to ''submit to cross-examination'' to avoid exclusion of their statements; the same exclusion of statements does not apply to a party or witness's refusal to answer questions posed by the decision-maker. If a party or witness refuses to respond to a decision-maker's questions, the decision-maker is not precluded from relying on that party or witness's statements.[1341] This is because cross-examination (which differs from questions posed by a neutral fact-finder) constitutes a unique opportunity for parties to present a decision-maker with the party's own perspectives about evidence. This adversarial testing of credibility renders the person's statements sufficiently reliable for consideration and fair for consideration by the decision-maker, in the context of a Title IX adjudication often overseen by laypersons rather than judges and lacking comprehensive rules of evidence that otherwise might determine reliability without cross-examination.

The Department disagrees that the phrase ''does not appear for cross-examination'' is clearer or leads to better results than this provision's language, ''does not submit to cross-examination.'' The former would permit a party or witness to appear but not engage in the cross-examination procedure, which would not achieve the benefits of cross-examination discussed above. For similar reasons, the Department declines to allow a party or witness to ''waive'' a question because such a rule would circumvent the benefits and purposes of cross-examination as a truth-seeking tool for postsecondary institutions' Title IX adjudications.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to clarify that although a decision-maker cannot rely on the statement of a party or witness who does not submit to cross-examination, the decision-maker cannot draw any inference about the determination regarding responsibility based solely on a party's or witness's absence from the hearing or refusal to answer cross-examination or other questions. This provision has been further revised to allow recipients discretion to hold live hearings with any or all parties, witnesses, and other participants appearing virtually, with technology enabling participants simultaneously to see and hear each other. The Department has also added § 106.71, prohibiting retaliation against any [1337] The Department notes that the final regulations add to § 106.45(b)(5)(i) a provision that restricts a recipient from accessing or using a party's treatment records without the party's voluntary, written consent. If the party is not an ''eligible student,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3, then the recipient must obtain the voluntary, written consent of a ''parent,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3.

[1341] The decision-maker still cannot draw any inference about the determination regarding responsibility based solely on a party's refusal to answer questions posed by the decision-maker; the final regulations refer in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to not drawing inferences based on refusal to answer ''cross-examination or other questions'' (emphasis added).

person exercising rights under Title IX including participating or refusing to participate in any grievance process. Section 106.45(b)(3)(ii), added in the final regulations, grants a recipient discretion to dismiss a formal complaint, or allegations therein, where the complainant notifies the Title IX Coordinator in writing that the complainants wishes to withdraw the allegations, or the respondent is no longer enrolled or employed by the recipient, or specific circumstances prevent the recipient from gathering evidence sufficient to reach a determination.

Rape Shield Protections

Comments: Some commenters supported the rape shield protections in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) (prohibiting questions or evidence about a complainant's prior sexual behavior or sexual predisposition, with two exceptions—where evidence of prior sexual behavior is offered to prove someone other than the respondent committed the alleged offense, or where prior sexual behavior evidence is specifically about the complainant and the respondent and is offered to prove consent) because prohibiting asking about a complainant's sexual history will give victims more control when bringing claims, and because these provisions protect victims' privacy.

Some commenters opposed the rape shield protections in § 106.45(b)(6)(i), arguing that the ban on evidence concerning a complainant's sexual history is too broad because evidence of a complainant's sexual history with the respondent should also be allowed to prove motive to fabricate or conceal a sexual interaction, and not only to prove consent. Commenters argued that Fed. R. Evid. 412 allows such evidence if the probative value substantially outweighs the danger of harm to any victim and of unfair prejudice to any party, and because the rape shield language in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) is based on Fed. R. Evid. 412, the final regulations should incorporate that exception as well. Commenters argued that Fed. R. Evid. 412(b)(1)(B) allows sexual history evidence to be offered by a criminal defendant without restriction but Fed. R. Evid. 412(b)(2) provides that in civil cases, sexual history evidence is admissible to prove consent only if its probative value substantially outweighs the danger of harm and unfair prejudice to a victim or any party; commenters argued that because a Title IX grievance process is more analogous to a civil trial than a criminal trial, the rape shield language in § 106.45(b)(6)(i)–(ii) should include the limitation contained in Fed. R. Evid. 412(b)(2).

Commenters argued that the prohibition against questions or evidence about sexual predisposition or sexual history should also apply to respondents so that the questioning focuses on the allegation at issue and does not delve into irrelevant details about a respondent's sexual history. At least one commenter mistakenly understood this provision to allow questions about a complainant's sexual history but not allow the same questions about a respondent's sexual history such that a respondent's propensity to violence or past behaviors speaking to a pattern could not be considered.

Commenters argued that an additional provision of Fed. R. Evid. 412 should be added into the final regulations: Allowance of ''evidence whose exclusion would violate the defendant's constitutional rights.''

Other commenters supported the rape shield language but expressed concern that the protections will be ineffective without comprehensive rules of evidence. Some commenters cited a study that found lawyers in many cases routinely attempt to circumvent rape shield limitations.[1342] Other commenters argued that because the rape shield protections are patterned after Fed. R. Evid. 412, the final regulations should incorporate the explanatory information in the Advisory Committee notes to Fed. R. Evid. 412 [1343] so that parties and decision-makers better understand the parameters of what kind of questioning is off-limits. Commenters argued that without further guidance on how to apply the rape shield limitations, the exceptions contained in this provision may still subject complainants to unwarranted invasions of privacy, character attacks, and sex stereotyping, and suggested that the final regulations specify how recipients should enforce the rape shield protections. Commenters argued that the two exceptions to the rape shield protections should be eliminated because having non-legal professionals try to determine the scope of the exceptions will result in the exceptions swallowing the rape shield protections. Commenters argued that the evidence exchange provision in § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) risks negating the rape shield protections in § 106.45(b)(6)(i)–(ii). Commenters asserted that because the proposed rules fail to define consent, the scope of the rape shield protections is unclear.

Commenters argued that the two rape shield exceptions are too favorable to respondents and unfair to complainants because those exceptions let respondents discuss a complainant's sexual history any time the respondent wants to point the finger at a third party or show consent was present due to consent being present in past sexual interactions, a problem that commenters argued will frequently arise since a significant number of sexual assaults are committed by intimate partners.[1344] Commenters argued that the rape shield exceptions expose a thinly disguised reworking of the rape myth that women in sexual harassment cases are so unreliable that they may be mistaken about who committed the act, and allow slut-shaming (implications that a woman with an extensive sexual history likely consented to sexual activity) to be used as a defense to a sexual assault accusation. Commenters argued that research shows that during sexual assault trials victims are routinely asked about their sexual history to imply the presence of consent, often relying on an incorrect assumption that women with more sexual experience are more likely to make a false allegation.[1345]

Commenters argued that the ''offered to prove consent'' exception should be eliminated because past sexual encounters, even with the respondent, are always irrelevant to issues of consent because valid consent can only ever be given in the particular moment.[1346] Commenters asserted that experts believe that there is no evidentiary theory under which sexual history is relevant to any claim or defense except when establishing a pattern of inappropriate behavior on the part of the harasser.[1347]

[1347] Commenters cited: Linda J. Krieger & Cindi Fox, Evidentiary Issues in Sexual Harassment

Commenters argued that this provision violates State laws, such as in New York, that have legislated an affirmative consent standard for campus sexual misconduct. Commenters asserted that this provision should: State that evidence of sexual behavior is never allowed to prove reputation or character (or only allowed if the complainant has placed the complainant's own reputation or character at issue);[1348] require that sexual behavior evidence that ostensibly meets one of the rape shield exceptions be allowed only if a neutral evaluator decides in advance that the evidence meets an exception and that its probative value outweighs potential harm or prejudice to the complainant; and require recipients to inform complainants in advance if such evidence will be allowed.

Commenters objected to use of the phrase ''sexual predisposition'' claiming the phrase harkens back to the past and puts on trial the sexual practices and identity of the complainant, which have no relevance to the adjudication of particular allegations.

Commenters wondered if the rape shield protected complainants during all stages of a grievance process, for example during the collection of evidence phase or during an informal resolution process, or only during a live hearing. Commenters stated that the rape shield provision, though well-intentioned, conflicts with other provisions in § 106.45 such as allowing the parties during investigation to review and respond to evidence gathered by the recipient as well as offer additional evidence during the investigation; these commenters asserted that while greater transparency in the grievance process is warranted and welcome, the unfettered right to introduce and review evidence conflicts with both the rape shield protections in the proposed rules and with some State laws that also prevent admission of prior sexual behavior evidence. Commenters argued that respondents should only be allowed to ask questions, especially about sexual behavior, after presenting an adequate foundation and where the questions do not rely on hearsay or speculation.

Commenters asserted that this provision does not accurately mirror Fed. R. Evid. 412 because the latter allows the evidence where it is ''offered by the defendant to prove consent or if offered by the prosecutor,'' and commenters argued that the final regulations should allow prior sexual behavior evidence ''if offered by the defendant to prove consent or welcomeness, or if offered by the institution or complainant.'' Commenters argued that this modification would appropriately allow testimony to be impeached when welcomeness is at issue in non-sexual assault situations, in addition to where consent is at issue in sexual violence situations, and would give a complainant or the institution equal opportunity to use such evidence where welcomeness or consent is contested. Other commenters argued that the rape shield language appeared not to take into account the full range of sexual harassment because under the second prong of the sexual harassment definition in § 106.30, consent is not an element but rather the issue might be whether the conduct was unwelcome versus invited, but, commenters asserted, even if sexual history was relevant in those situations, the relevance would be outweighed by potential harm to the complainant and so should be excluded.

Commenters argued that this provision's wording in the NPRM, referring to ''cross-examination must exclude evidence of the complainant's sexual behavior or predisposition'' lacked clarity because questions are not evidence, though questions can lead to testimony that is evidence, and the provision was thus ambiguous as to whether the rape shield protections applied solely to ''questions'' or also to ''evidence'' that concerns a complainant's sexual behavior or predisposition. Commenters widely used the phrase ''prior sexual behavior'' or ''prior sexual history'' in reference to the rape shield provision in § 106.45(b)(6)(i). Commenters noted that some State laws, for example Maryland and New York, address the same issue with rules prohibiting ''prior'' sexual history.

Discussion: The Department agrees with commenters that the rape shield protections serve a critically important purpose in a Title IX sexual harassment grievance process: Protecting complainants from being asked about or having evidence considered regarding sexual behavior, with two limited exceptions. The final regulations clarify that such questions, and evidence, are not only excluded at a hearing, but are deemed irrelevant.

The Department disagrees that the rape shield language is too broad. Scenarios described by commenters, where a respondent might wish to prove the complainant had a motive to fabricate or conceal a sexual interaction, do not require admission or consideration of the complainant's sexual behavior. Respondents in that scenario could probe a complainant's motive by, for example, inquiring whether a complainant had a dating or romantic relationship with a person other than the respondent, without delving into a complainant's sexual behavior; sexual behavior evidence would remain irrelevant in such circumstances. Commenters correctly note that the Department adapted the rape shield language in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) from Fed. R. Evid. 412.[1349] As with other determinations about what procedures should be part of a § 106.45 grievance process, the Department carefully considered whether Fed. R. Evid. 412 would be useful in formulating rape shield provisions for application in Title IX adjudications. However, the final regulations do not import wholesale Fed. R. Evid. 412. The Department believes the protections of the rape shield language remain stronger if decision-makers are not given discretion to decide that sexual behavior is admissible where its probative value substantially outweighs the danger of harm to a victim and unfair prejudice to any party. If the Department permitted decision-makers to balance ambiguous factors like ''unfair prejudice'' to make admissibility decisions, the final regulations would convey an expectation that a non-lawyer decision-maker must possess the legal expertise of judges and lawyers. Instead, the Department expects decision-makers to apply a single admissibility rule (relevance), including this provision's specification that sexual behavior is irrelevant with two concrete exceptions. This approach leaves the decision-maker discretion to assign weight and credibility to evidence, but not to deem evidence inadmissible or excluded, except on the ground of relevance (and in conformity with other requirements in § 106.45, including the provisions discussed above whereby the decision-maker cannot rely on statements of a party or witness if the party or witness did not submit to cross-examination, a party's treatment records cannot be used without the party's voluntary consent, and information protected by a legally recognized privilege cannot be used).

As the Court has explained, rape shield protections are intended to protect complainants 'from being exposed at trial to harassing or irrelevant questions concerning their past sexual behavior.' Michigan v. Lucas, 500 U.S. 145, 146 (1991).'').

The Department declines to extend the rape shield language to respondents. The Department does not wish to impose more restrictions on relevance than necessary to further the goals of a Title IX sexual harassment adjudication, and does not believe that a respondent's sexual behavior requires a special provision to adequately protect respondents from questions or evidence that are irrelevant. By contrast, in order to counteract historical, societal misperceptions that a complainant's sexual history is somehow always relevant to sexual assault allegations, the Department follows the rationale of the Advisory Committee's Note to Fed. R. Evid. 412, and the Supreme Court's observation in Michigan v. Lucas,[1350] that rape shield protections are intended to protect complainants from harassing, irrelevant questions at trial. The Department cautions recipients that some situations will involve counter-claims made between two parties, such that a respondent is also a complainant, and in such situations the recipient must take care to apply the rape shield protections to any party where the party is designated as a ''complainant'' even if the same party is also a ''respondent'' in a consolidated grievance process.[1351] The Department clarifies here that the rape shield language in this provision considers all questions and evidence of a complainant's sexual predisposition irrelevant, with no exceptions; questions and evidence about a complainant's prior sexual behavior are irrelevant unless they meet one of the two exceptions; and questions and evidence about a respondent's sexual predisposition or prior sexual behavior are not subject to any special consideration but rather must be judged like any other question or evidence as relevant or irrelevant to the allegations at issue.

For two reasons, the Department also declines to import the additional provision in Fed. R. Evid. 412 that would allow in evidence ''whose exclusion would violate the defendant's constitutional rights.'' First, this exception to the preclusion of sexual behavior evidence is intended to protect the constitutional rights of criminal defendants, and respondents in a Title IX grievance process are not due the same rights as criminal defendants. Second, the Department believes that the procedures in § 106.45, including the use of relevance as the only admissibility criterion, ensure that trained, layperson decision-makers are capable of making relevance determinations and then evaluating relevant evidence with discretion to decide how persuasive certain evidence is to a determination regarding responsibility, whereas imposing a complex set of evidentiary rules would make it less likely that a non-lawyer would feel competent to be a recipient's decision-maker. The final regulations permit a wide universe of evidence that may be ''relevant'' (and thus not subject to exclusion), and the Department believes it is unlikely that a recipient applying the § 106.45 grievance process with its robust procedural protections would be found to have violated any respondent's constitutional rights, whether under due process of law Supreme Court cases like Mathews and Goss, or the Sixth Circuit's due process decision in Baum.[1352] As discussed above, we have revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to direct a decision-maker who must not rely on the statement of a party who has not appeared or submitted to cross-examination not to draw any inference about the determination regarding responsibility based on the party's absence or refusal to be cross-examined (or refusal to answer other questions, such as those posed by the decision-maker). This modification provides protection to respondents exercising Fifth Amendment rights against self-incrimination (though it applies equally to protect complainants who choose not to appear or testify).

For reasons discussed above, the Department believes that well-trained decision-makers are fully capable of determining relevance of questions and evidence, including the special consideration given to a complainant's sexual history under this provision. Section 106.45(b)(1)(iii) has been revised to require decision-makers to be trained on issues of relevance, including specifically application of the rape shield protections. Regardless of studies that show that lawyers routinely try to circumvent rape shield protections, the Department expects recipients to ensure that decision-makers accurately determine the relevance and irrelevance of a complainant's sexual history in accordance with these regulations. The Department disagrees that the two exceptions in the rape shield provisions should be eliminated because non-lawyer decision-makers will misapply this provision and end up allowing questions and evidence contrary to this provision. Nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient from including in its training of decision-makers information about the purpose and scope of rape shield language in Fed. R. Evid. 412, including the Advisory Committee Notes, so long as the training remains focused on applying the rape shield protections as formulated in these final regulations.

The Department disagrees that the evidence exchange provision in § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) negates the rape shield protections in § 106.45(b)(6)(i)–(ii). As noted by the Supreme Court, rape shield protections generally are designed to protect complainants from harassing, irrelevant inquiries into sexual behavior at trial.[1353] The final regulations permit exchange of all evidence ''directly related to the allegations in a formal complaint'' during the investigation, but require the investigator to only summarize ''relevant'' evidence in the investigative report (which would exclude sexual history information deemed by these final regulations to be ''not relevant''), and require the decision-maker to objectively evaluate only ''relevant'' evidence during the hearing and when reaching the determination regarding responsibility. To further reinforce the importance of correct application of the rape shield protections, we have revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to explicitly state that only relevant questions may be asked, and the decision-maker must determine the relevance of each cross-examination question before a party or witness must answer.

Commenters correctly observe that the final regulations do not define ''consent.'' For reasons explained in the [1350] 500 U.S. 145, 146 (1991) (''Like most States, Michigan has a 'rape-shield' statute designed to protect victims of rape from being exposed at trial to harassing or irrelevant questions concerning their past sexual behavior.'') (emphasis added).

[1351] Section 106.45(b)(4) allows consolidation of formal complaints, in a recipient's discretion, when allegations arise from the same facts or circumstances.

[1352] As acknowledged in § 106.6(d), the Department will not enforce these regulations in a manner that requires any recipient to violate the U.S. Constitution, including the First Amendment, Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment, or any other constitutional provision. The Department believes that the § 106.45 grievance process allows, and expects, recipients to apply the grievance process in a manner that avoids violation of any party's constitutional rights.

''Consent'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble, the final regulations clarify that the Department will not require recipients to adopt a particular definition of consent. This provision in § 106.30 allows recipients flexibility to use a definition of sexual consent that best reflects the recipient's values and/or complies with State laws that require recipients to adopt particular definitions of consent for campus sexual misconduct proceedings. The second of the two exceptions to the rape shield protections refers to ''if offered to prove consent'' and thus the scope of that exception will turn in part on the definition of consent adopted by each recipient. Decision-makers will be trained in how to conduct a grievance process and specifically on how to apply the rape shield protections, which will include the recipient's adopted definition of consent, and thus the decision-maker will understand how to apply the rape shield language in accordance with that definition. Because of the flexibility recipients have under these final regulations to adopt a definition of consent, the Department disagrees that the scope of the second exception to the rape shield protections is too broad or favors respondents. Rather, the scope of the ''offered to prove consent'' exception is determined in part by a recipient's definition of consent, which may be broad or narrow at the recipient's discretion. The Department disagrees that the first exception (''offered to prove that someone other than the respondent'' committed the alleged misconduct) is too broad, because in order for that exception to apply a respondent's contention must be that someone other than the respondent is the person who committed the sexual harassment; commenters have informed the Department that this defense is not common compared to the defense that a sexual interaction occurred but consent was present, a conclusion buttressed by commenters' assertions that a significant number of sexual assaults are committed by intimate partners. When a respondent has evidence that someone else committed the alleged sexual harassment, a respondent must have opportunity to pursue that defense, or else a determination reached by the decision-maker may be an erroneous outcome, mistakenly identifying the nature of sexual harassment occurring in the recipient's education program or activity.[1354]

Neither of the two exceptions to the rape shield protections promote the notion that women, or complainants generally, are unreliable and that they may be mistaken about who committed an assault, or allow slut-shaming as a defense to sexual assault accusations. Rather, the first exception applies to the narrow circumstance where a respondent contends that someone other than the respondent committed the misconduct, and the second applies narrowly to allow sexual behavior questions or evidence concerning incidents between the complainant and respondent if offered to prove consent. The second exception does not admit sexual history evidence of a complainant's sexual behavior with someone other than the respondent; thus, ''slut-shaming'' or implication that a woman with an extensive sexual history probably consented to sexual activity with the respondent, is not validated or promoted by this provision. As noted above, the scope of when sexual behavior between the complainant and respondent might be relevant to the presence of consent regarding the particular allegations at issue depends in part on a recipient's definition of consent. Not all definitions of consent, for example, require a verbal expression of consent; some definitions of consent inquire whether based on circumstances the respondent reasonably understood that consent was present (or absent), thus potentially making relevant evidence of past sexual interactions between the complainant and the respondent. The Department reiterates that the rape shield language in this provision does not pertain to the sexual predisposition or sexual behavior of respondents, so evidence of a pattern of inappropriate behavior by an alleged harasser must be judged for relevance as any other evidence must be.

As discussed above, the Department defers to recipients on a definition of consent, and thus recipients subject to State laws imposing particular definitions may comply with those State laws during a § 106.45 grievance process. The recipient's definition of consent will determine the scope of the rape shield exception that refers to ''consent.'' The Department does not believe that the provision needs to expressly state that a complainant's sexual behavior can never be allowed to prove a complainant's reputation or character; rather, this provision already deems irrelevant all questions or evidence of a complainant's prior sexual behavior unless offered to prove that someone other than the respondent committed the alleged offense or if the questions or evidence concern specific sexual behavior between the complainant and respondent and are offered to prove consent. No other use of a complainant's sexual behavior is authorized under this provision.

The Department declines to require questions or evidence that may meet one of the rape shield exceptions to be allowed to be asked or presented at a hearing only if a neutral evaluator first decides that one of the two exceptions applies. As discussed above, the decision-maker will be trained in how to conduct a grievance process, including how to determine relevance and how to apply the rape shield protections, and at the live hearing the decision-maker must determine the relevance of a cross-examination question before a party or witness must answer. As discussed above, the Department declines to import a balancing test that would exclude sexual behavior questions and evidence (even meeting the two exceptions) unless probative value substantially outweighs potential harm or undue prejudice, because that open-ended, complicated standard of admissibility would render the adjudication more difficult for a layperson decision-maker competently to apply. Unlike the two exceptions in this provision, a balancing test of probative value, harm, and prejudice contains no concrete factors for a decision-maker to look to in making the relevance determination.

The Department's use of the phrase ''sexual predisposition'' is mirrored in Fed. R. Evid. 412; far from indicating intent to harken back to the past where sexual practices of a complainant were used against a complainant, the final regulations take a strong position that questions or evidence of a complainant's ''sexual predisposition'' are simply irrelevant, without exception.

The final regulations clarify the rape shield language to state that questions and evidence subject to the rape shield protections are ''not relevant,'' and therefore the rape shield protections apply wherever the issue is whether evidence is relevant or not. As noted above, this means that where § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) requires review and inspection of evidence ''directly related to the allegations'' that universe of evidence is not screened for relevance, but rather is measured by whether it is ''directly related to the allegations.'' However, the investigative report must [1354] The Department notes that where a decision-maker determines, for example, that the respondent is not responsible for the allegations in the formal complaint, but also determines that the complainant did suffer the alleged sexual harassment but it was perpetrated by someone other than the respondent, the recipient is free to provide supportive measures to the complainant designed to restore or preserve equal access to education.

summarize ''relevant'' evidence, and thus at that point the rape shield protections would apply to preclude inclusion in the investigative report of irrelevant evidence. The Department believes these provisions work consistently and logically as part of the § 106.45 grievance process, under which all evidence is evaluated for whether it is directly related to the allegations, evidence summarized in the investigative report must be relevant, and evidence (and questions) presented in front of, and considered by, the decision-maker must be relevant. The Department declines to require respondents to ''lay a foundation'' before asking questions, or to impose rules excluding questions based on hearsay or speculation. For reasons described above, relevance is the sole gatekeeper evidentiary rule in the final regulations, but decision-makers retain discretion regarding the weight or credibility to assign to particular evidence. Further, for the reasons discussed above, while the final regulations do not address ''hearsay evidence'' as such, § 106.45(b)(6)(i) does preclude a decision-maker from relying on statements of a party or witness who has not submitted to cross-examination at the live hearing.

The Department notes that the rape shield language does not limit the ''if offered to prove consent'' exception to when the question or evidence is offered by the respondent. Rather, such questions or evidence could be offered by either party, or by the investigator, or solicited on the decision-maker's own initiative. The Department appreciates commenters' suggestion that the rape shield exception regarding ''to prove consent'' apply to proof of ''welcomeness'' so that it would apply to allegations of sexual harassment that turn on welcomeness and not on consent of the victim. However, as explained in the ''Sexual Harassment'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble, the Department interprets the ''unwelcome'' element in the first and second prongs of the § 106.30 definition of sexual harassment subjectively; that is, if conduct is unwelcome to the complainant, that is sufficient to support that element of an allegation of sexual harassment. By contrast, the final regulations impose a reasonable person standard on the other elements in the second prong of the § 106.45 definition—whether the unwelcome conduct was so ''severe, pervasive, and objectively offensive'' that it ''effectively denied a person equal access'' to education. The Department therefore declines to extend the rape shield language to encompass situations where the respondent wishes to prove the conduct was ''welcome'' as opposed to ''unwelcome.'' The Department rejects the premise that a respondent may need to use a complainant's sexual behavior to challenge a complainant's subjective interpretation of conduct as unwelcome. Respondents facing allegations under the first or second prong of the § 106.30 definition may defend by, for example, arguing that the unwelcome conduct was not ''conditioning any aid or benefit'' on participation in the unwelcome sexual activity, or that the unwelcome conduct was not ''severe'' or was not ''pervasive,'' etc. A complainant's sexual behavior is simply irrelevant to those defenses. Contrary to commenters' concerns, the rape shield language deems irrelevant all questions or evidence of a complainant's sexual behavior unless offered to prove consent (and it concerns specific instances of sexual behavior with the respondent); thus, if ''consent'' is not at issue—for example, where the allegations concern solely unwelcome conduct under the first or second prong of the § 106.30 definition—then that exception does not even apply, and the rape shield protections would then bar all questions and evidence about a complainant's sexual behavior, with no need to engage in a balancing test of whether the value of the evidence is outweighed by harm or prejudice.

The Department is persuaded by commenters who argued that the NPRM's wording of the rape shield language lacked clarity as to whether ''exclusion'' applied only to questions, or also to evidence. The Department has revised this provision in the final regulations to refer to both questions and evidence, and replace reference to ''exclusion'' with deeming the sexual predisposition and sexual behavior questions or evidence to be ''not relevant'' (subject to the same two exceptions as stated in the NPRM). To conform the final regulations with the intent of the rape shield provision and with commenters' widely understood view of this provision, we have added the word ''prior'' before ''sexual behavior'' in § 106.45(b)(6)(i), and in § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) that contains the same rape shield language.[1355]

Changes: The Department has revised the rape shield language in § 106.45(b)(6)(i)–(ii) to clarify that questions and evidence about the complainant's prior sexual behavior or predisposition are not relevant unless offered to prove that someone other than the respondent committed the offense or if the sexual history evidence concerns specific sexual incidents with the respondent and is offered to prove consent. We have also revised § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to require decision-makers to be trained on issues of relevance, including application of the rape shield protections in § 106.45(b)(6).

Separate Rooms for Cross-Examination Facilitated by Technology; Directed Question 9

Comments: Some commenters supported the provision in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) that upon request of any party a recipient must permit cross-examination to occur with the parties located in separate rooms with technology facilitating the ability of all participants to see and hear the person answering questions. Commenters asserted that this provision appropriately acknowledges the intimidating nature of cross-examination. Commenters also asserted that this provision reaches a reasonable balance between allowing cross-examination and protecting victims from personal confrontation with a perpetrator. Some commenters supported this provision but expressed concern that the live question-and-answer format, even avoiding face-to-face trauma, will still impose significant trauma for both parties. Commenters stated that many recipients already effectively utilize technology to enable parties to testify at live hearings without being physically present in the same room at the same time, including asking the non-testifying party to wait in a separate room listening by telephone or watching by videoconference while the testifying party is in the same room as the decision-maker, and then the parties switch rooms with safety measures imposed so the parties do not encounter each other during transitions.

[1355] The Department notes that ''prior'' sexual behavior is a phrase widely used by commenters to discuss rape shield protections, and commenters noted that various State laws, such as New York and Maryland, use the word ''prior'' to distinguish a complainant's sexual behavior that is unrelated to the sexual misconduct allegations at issue. The Department emphasizes that ''prior'' does not imply admissibility of questions or evidence about a complainant's sexual behavior that occurred after the alleged sexual harassment incident, but rather must mean anything ''prior'' to conclusion of the grievance process. This aligns with the intent of Fed. R. Evid. 412, which prohibits evidence of a victim's ''other'' sexual behavior; the Advisory Committee Notes on that rule explain that use of the word ''other'' is to ''suggest some flexibility in admitting evidence 'intrinsic' to the alleged sexual misconduct.'' The Department chooses to use the phrase ''prior sexual behavior'' rather than ''other sexual behavior'' because based on public comments, ''prior sexual behavior'' is a widely understood reference to evidence unrelated to the alleged sexual harassment at issue.

At least one commenter opposed this provision, arguing that there is no substitute for direct eye contact and full view of a person's mannerisms and gestures, which will not be as effective using technology, even though face-to-face confrontation may cause trauma to both complainants and respondents.

Some commenters opposed this provision, asserting that complainants should not be forced to be ''live streamed'' and instead should have the right to remain anonymous. Some commenters argued that ''watering down'' the Sixth Amendment right to face-to-face confrontation just to avoid traumatizing victims is not appropriate because the Constitution expects victims to endure the experience of making their accusations directly in front of an accused [1356] and the proposed rules do not even require a threshold showing of the potential for trauma before granting a request to permit virtual testimony.

Other commenters argued that separating the parties does not adequately diminish the intimidating, retraumatizing prospect of a live hearing. Commenters shared personal examples of being cross-examined during Title IX proceedings and feeling traumatized even with the respondent located in a separate room; one commenter described being cross-examined during a hearing with the perpetrator telling each question to a judge, who then asked the question over Skype if the judge approved the question, and the commenter stated that even with technology separating the commenter from the perpetrator, the commenter was still diagnosed a week later with PTSD (post-traumatic stress disorder). Commenters argued that survivors of sexual violence will still be aware that their attacker is witnessing the proceedings and may feel less safe as a result. At least one commenter argued that accommodating a complainant's request to testify from a separate room puts the complainant at a disadvantage because, for example, the respondent might be located in the same room as the decision-maker who would thus have a greater opportunity to ''develop a personal connection'' with the respondent than with the complainant, and advantage the respondent by allowing the respondent to observe the decision-maker's reactions to testimony while the complainant cannot observe those reactions when located in a separate room. At least one commenter argued that remote cross-examination puts survivors at a distinct disadvantage because assessing non-verbal and behavioral evidence of trauma is necessary in sexual violence incidents.

At least one commenter argued that witnesses must also be given the right to request to testify in a separate room. One commenter recounted a case in which a witness had also been raped by the respondent but the recipient did not allow the witness to testify in a separate room and the witness had to frequently leave the room during testimony due to sobbing too hard to speak.

Commenters opposed requiring testimony in separate rooms on the basis that internet functionality on campus is not always reliable, and thus a rule that depends on technology is not realistic. Commenters supported use of technology to facilitate parties being in separate rooms as ''ideal'' but expressed concern that the cost of technology that is both reliable and secure could be prohibitive for some recipients because while software enabling simultaneous viewing of parties in separate rooms may be relatively inexpensive, acquiring additional hardware that may be necessary and expensive, such as audio-visual equipment, monitors, and microphones. Commenters stated that some recipients do not currently have technology set up in the spaces used for Title IX proceedings and acquiring the requisite technology would be costly.[1357] Commenters asserted that complying with this provision may also require acquisition of, or renovations to, facilities that are not currently used for Title IX purposes by the recipient, or specialized technology that meets the needs of individuals with disabilities, resulting in expenditures that will only be used for the limited purpose of Title IX hearings. Commenters requested that the Department provide grant funding for acquiring technology needed to meet this provision.

Other commenters asserted that it is reasonable for separate rooms to be used to ensure complete, comfortable honesty by each party and that numerous low cost, secure presentation videoconferencing technologies are available and already in use by many recipients to ensure that participants can view and hear questions and responses in real time.[1358] Some commenters stated that while this provision would require some monetary investment in technology the requirement was reasonable and beneficial to allow the parties to participate in a hearing from separate rooms.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support for the provision in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) that requires recipients, upon any party's request, to permit cross-examination to occur with the parties in separate rooms using technology that enables participants to see and hear the person answering questions. Commenters correctly asserted that this provision is a direct acknowledgment of the potential for cross-examination to feel intimidating and retraumatizing in sexual harassment cases. Because the decision-maker cannot know until the conclusion of a fair, reliable grievance process whether a complainant is a victim of sexual harassment perpetrated by the respondent, cross-examination is necessary to test party and witness statements for veracity and accuracy, but the Department has determined that the full value of cross-examination can be achieved while shielding the complainant from being in the physical presence of the respondent. The Department disagrees that only in-person, face-to-face confrontation enables parties and decision-makers to adequately evaluate credibility,[1359] and declines to remove this shielding provision. As discussed above, assessing demeanor is just one of the ways in which cross-examination tests credibility, which includes assessing plausibility, consistency, and reliability; judging truthfulness based solely on demeanor has been shown to be less accurate than, for instance, evaluating credibility based on consistency.[1360] Thus, any minimal reduction in the ability to gauge demeanor by use of technology is outweighed by the benefits of shielding victims from testifying in the presence of a perpetrator. The Department disagrees that complainants should have to make a threshold showing that trauma is likely because the Department is persuaded by the many commenters who asserted that facing a perpetrator is inherently traumatic for a victim. Further, the Sixth Amendment's Confrontation Clause protects criminal defendants, and the Department is not obligated to ensure that this provision would comply with the Confrontation Clause, which does not apply to a respondent in a noncriminal adjudication under Title IX.

The Department notes that recipients are obligated under § 106.71 to ''keep confidential the identity of any individual who has made a report or complaint of sex discrimination, including any individual who has made a report or filed a formal complaint of sexual harassment, any complainant, any individual who has been reported to be the perpetrator of sex discrimination, any respondent, and any witness'' in a Title IX grievance process except as permitted by FERPA, required by law, or as necessary to conduct the hearing or proceeding; this cautions recipients to ensure that technology used to comply with this provision does not result in ''live streaming'' a party in a manner that exposes the testimony to persons outside those participating in the hearing.

The Department understands commenters' assertions that even with shielding, cross-examination by a respondent's advisor may still be a daunting prospect. The final regulations provide both parties with the right to be supported and assisted by an advisor of choice, and protect the parties' ability to discuss the allegations freely, including for the purpose of seeking out emotional support or strategic advice.[1361] The final regulations do not preclude a recipient from adopting rules (applied equally to complainants and respondents) that govern the taking of breaks and conferences with advisors during a hearing, to further ameliorate the stress and emotional difficulty of answering questions about sensitive, traumatic events. We have also revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to provide that upon a party's request the entire live hearing (and not only cross-examination) must occur with the parties located in separate rooms. These measures are intended to balance the need for statements to be tested for credibility so that accurate outcomes are reached, with accommodations for the sensitive nature of the underlying matters at issue.

The Department disagrees that shielding under § 106.45(b)(6)(i) disadvantages complainants (or respondents) and reiterates that both parties' meaningful opportunity to advance their own interests in a case may be achieved by party advisors conducting cross-examination virtually. The Department notes that decision-makers are obligated to serve impartially and thus should not endeavor to ''develop a personal relationship'' with one party over another regardless of whether one party is located in a separate room or not. For the same reasons that judging credibility solely on demeanor presents risks of inaccuracy generally, the Department cautions that judging credibility based on a complainant's demeanor through the lens of whether observed demeanor is ''evidence of trauma'' presents similar risks of inaccuracy.[1362] The Department reiterates that while assessing demeanor is one part of judging credibility, other factors are consistency, plausibility, and reliability. Real-time cross-examination presents an opportunity for parties and decision-makers to test and evaluate credibility based on all these factors.

The Department declines to grant witnesses the right to demand to testify in a separate room, but revises § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to allow a recipient the discretion to permit any participant to appear remotely. Unlike complainants, witnesses usually do not experience the same risk of trauma through cross-examination. Witnesses also are not required to testify and may simply choose not to testify because the determination of responsibility usually does not directly impact, implicate, or affect them. With respect to a witness who claims to also have been sexually assaulted by the respondent, the recipient has discretion to permit the witness to testify remotely, or to hold the entire live hearing virtually.

The Department appreciates commenters' assertions that some recipients already effectively use technology to enable virtual hearings, and other commenters' concerns that acquiring technology may cause a recipient to incur costs. The Department agrees with some commenters who asserted that even where this provision requires a monetary investment in technology, low-cost technology is available and the importance of this shielding provision outweighs the burden of setting up the requisite technology. Although this shielding provision requires that a Title IX live hearing would be held in two ''separate rooms'' the Department is not persuaded that such a requirement necessitates any recipient's capital investment in renovations or acquiring new real property, because the Department is unaware of a recipient whose existing facilities consist of a single room. These final regulations do not address the eligibility or purpose of grant funding for recipients, and the Department thus declines to provide technology grants via these regulations.

Changes: We have revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to allow recipients, in their discretion, to hold live hearings virtually or for any participant to appear remotely, using technology to enable participants to see and hear each other, and to require a recipient to grant any party's request for the entire live hearing to be held with the parties located in separate rooms.

Discretion To Hold Live Hearings and Control Conduct of Hearings

Comments: Many commenters supported the requirement in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) that postsecondary institutions hold live hearings at the conclusion of an investigation of a formal complaint, because a live hearing ensures that the decision-maker hears from the parties and witnesses, which gives both parties an opportunity to present their side of the story to the decision-maker and reduces opportunity for biased decision making. Commenters argued that in the college or university setting, where the participants are usually adults, live hearings provide the most transparent mechanism for ensuring all parties have the opportunity to submit, review, contest, and rebut evidence to be considered by the fact-finder in reaching a determination, and this is critical where both parties' interests are at stake and potential sanctions are serious.[1363] Commenters stated that live hearings are the only method by which deciding parties can accurately assess the veracity of both the complainant's and respondent's statements, and where allegations have been tested in a live hearing and the determination finds the respondent to be responsible that outcome is more likely to be reliable and less likely to be overturned on appeal or in litigation. Commenters argued that requiring a live hearing ensures that all parties see the same evidence and testimony as the fact-finder, so that each party can fully rebut or buttress that evidence and testimony to serve the party's own interest. Commenters argued that live hearings also decrease the chance that the bias of a single investigator or fact-finder may warp the process by reaching determinations not by the facts and a desire for a just outcome, but by prejudice, well-intentioned or otherwise.

Many commenters opposed the live hearing requirement. Commenters argued that even though the withdrawn 2011 Dear Colleague Letter caused many recipients to overcorrect their sexual misconduct policies by shirking due process responsibilities,[1364] commenters asserted that recipients should have the option but not the mandate to provide live hearings to preserve recipients' flexibility to design a fair process. Commenters argued that live hearings make campus proceedings so much like court proceedings that the benefit of going through an equitable Title IX process instead of formal court trials will be lost.[1365] Commenters argued that while hearings and cross-examination may be deeply rooted in the legal system, such procedures are not deeply rooted in school disciplinary processes. Commenters also argued that requiring live hearings is going ''a bridge too far'' because recipients are not equipped to conduct court-like hearings.

Commenters argued that requiring an adversarial, high-stakes live hearing ignores many cultures that rely on the inquisitorial system to achieve justice, under which decision makers are vested with the duty of fact finding instead of pitting the parties against each other to offer competing versions of the truth.

Commenters asserted that live hearings add no value to the fact-finding process so long as a full, fair investigation was conducted. Commenters described experiences with particular recipients where the recipient used a live hearing model for a significant period of time but stopped using a live hearing model after experiencing pitfalls that outweighed its usefulness, stating that hearings became a springboard to introduce new evidence and witnesses, embarrassed parties in ways that derailed the hearing, and hearing panels were left needing legal advice on a myriad of issues like evidentiary determinations. Commenters argued that while school employees who are asked to adjudicate are well-intentioned, they lack the legal expertise and immunity available in court proceedings, and an investigative model has been more efficient than a live hearing model, has resulted in fewer contested outcomes, and has led to increased reporting of sexual harassment.

Commenters asserted that a live hearing contains no mechanism to act as a check against bias [1366] and that decision-makers are capable of being impartial and reaching unbiased decisions without the parties and witnesses appearing at a live hearing.

Likening campus disciplinary proceedings to administrative proceedings, commenters argued that courts permit a wide variety of administrative proceedings to utilize less formal procedures and still comport with constitutional due process, for example allowing consideration of hearsay evidence, not requiring a live hearing, and not requiring cross-examination, even when such proceedings implicate liberty and property interests.[1367]

Commenters asserted that sometimes a witness is a friend of a party and must truthfully share information that damages the witness's friendship with the party, and that while a witness might be willing to put truth above friendship by privately talking to an investigator, a witness is less likely to do this when it requires testimony at a live hearing in front of the witness's friend. Commenters argued that the live hearing requirement puts a burden on the parties to pressure or cajole their friends into appearing as witnesses because the recipient has no subpoena power to compel witness participation.

Commenters argued that requiring the formal process of a live hearing demonstrates that the proposed regulations value the potential future of respondents more than the safety and well-being of complainants. Commenters asserted that the formalities of a live hearing with cross-examination ''swing the pendulum'' too far when schools need a refined approach to reach balanced fairness.

Commenters asserted that recipients have spent time and resources developing non-hearing adjudication models and should have the flexibility to continue using such models so long as the procedures are fair and equitable. Commenters asserted that requiring live hearings will force recipients to abandon hybrid investigatory models that recipients have carefully developed over the last several years.

Commenters argued that where the facts are not contested, or where the respondent has admitted responsibility, or video evidence of the incident in question exists, there is no need to put parties through the ordeal of a live hearing yet the proposed rules would force an institution to hold a live hearing anyway, straining the limited resources of all schools but especially smaller institutions. One commenter argued that if, for example, a respondent video-taped the respondent raping a student and the hearing officer watches the video and hears from the complainant who confirms the incident did happen, and the respondent denies doing it, a live hearing with cross-examination would not be useful in such a scenario.

Commenters suggested that this provision be modified to require the parties to attempt mediation, so that a live hearing is required only if mediation fails. Commenters stated that some recipients use an administrative disposition model where a respondent may accept responsibility based on an investigator's findings and the final regulations should permit the recipient, or the respondent, in that situation to waive the right to a live hearing. Commenters asserted that the final regulations should include a provision allowing the parties to enter into a voluntary resolution agreement (VRA) that includes disciplinary action against the respondent, where the recipient could offer the VRA to both parties in advance of a live hearing, and if the parties accepted the VRA it would become the final outcome, or the parties could reject the VRA and demand a live hearing. Other commenters argued that either party should have the right to waive a live hearing so that a live hearing should only occur if both parties and the recipient agree it is the appropriate method of resolution for a particular case.

Commenters argued that the proposed regulations do not allow universities to follow State APAs (Administrative Procedure Acts), for example in Washington State where a student may appeal a responsibility finding made in an investigation to a live hearing, or in New York where New York Education Law Article 129–B (known as ''Enough is Enough'') allows written submission of questions instead of live cross-examination. Commenters argued that some public universities are already subject to State APAs that impose the kind of live hearings and cross-examination procedures required by these final regulations, and recipients find these procedures to be burdensome, costly, and lengthy.

Commenters quoted a Federal district court memorandum from 1968 setting forth guidelines on how that district court should evaluate claims against tax-funded colleges and universities, where the court memorandum stated the nature and procedures of college discipline should not be required to conform to Federal criminal law processes which are ''far from perfect'' and designed for circumstances unrelated to the academic community.[1368] Commenters argued that most Federal courts adopt that approach, acknowledging that student discipline is part of the education process and is not punitive in the criminal sense; rather, expelled students may suffer damaging effects but do not face imprisonment, fines, disenfranchisement, or probation. Commenters asserted that deference to a college or university's chosen disciplinary system is even more warranted for private institutions that do not owe constitutional due process to students or employees.[1369]

Many commenters argued that the NPRM gave recipients too little flexibility to determine how hearings should be conducted, and that the final regulations should grant recipients discretion to adopt rules to control the conduct and environment of hearings in a manner that is effective and fair to all parties and witnesses. Some commenters suggested that the final regulations should state more broadly that recipients must offer parties reasonable mitigating measures during a live hearing, of which locating the parties in separate rooms is but one example.

Commenters asked for clarification such as: Can recipients limit the hearing to consideration only of evidence previously included in the investigative report? Can recipients impose rules of evidence left unaddressed by the proposed regulations, such as excluding questions that are misleading, assume facts not in evidence, or call for disclosure of attorney-client privileged information, or questions that are cumulative, repetitive, or abusive? Can recipients impose time limits on hearings so that parties and witnesses do not spend multiple days in a hearing rather than fulfilling their academic or work responsibilities? Can a recipient specify who may raise objections to evidence during the hearing?

Commenters asserted that live hearings are administratively time-consuming and will lengthen the grievance process by requiring both parties and their advisors to be on campus simultaneously, which is impractical and often undesirable. Commenters urged the Department to authorize recipients to hold the entire live hearing virtually, with parties in separate locations, using technology so that each party can see and hear all other parties, because some recipients offer mostly online courses such that parties might reside significant distances from any physical campus, or parties may move or be called to military service after a formal complaint has been filed, or the alleged harassment itself may have occurred entirely online and the parties may not reside close to campus. Commenters asserted that since the proposed rules already allow the parties to be located in separate rooms, there is no reason not to also allow a recipient to hold the entire hearing virtually using technology. At least one commenter asserted that even allowing participation virtually would not make this provision fair because the commenter had a case in which a key witness was studying abroad in a country with a large time zone difference making it impossible for the witness to testify even remotely using technology. Commenters argued that coordinating the schedules of parties, advisors, hearing panels, and witnesses to appear for a live hearing will delay proceedings. Other commenters stated that some rural university systems have satellite campuses in remote locations off the road system, with insufficient internet access even to allow videoconferencing, posing significant barriers to complying with a live hearing requirement.

Commenters asserted that all hearings should be recorded and either a transcript or video or audio recording should be provided to each party following the hearing, so the parties have access to it when appealing decisions or possibly for later use in litigation, because too many Title IX proceedings have occurred in secret, behind closed doors, with no record of the proceedings. According to this commenter, universities typically forbid parties from recording hearings and not having such a record can allow a grievance board's illegal bias against a party to fester and remain unchecked by the university, regulatory agencies, or the courts.

[1369] Commenters cited: William A. Kaplin & Barbara A. Lee, The Law of Higher Education § 10.2.3 (5th ed. 2013) (''Private institutions, not being subject to federal constitutional constraints, have even more latitude than public institutions do in promulgating disciplinary rules.'').

One commenter asserted that hearings should be closed and attended only by the parties, their advisors, witnesses, and school officials relevant to the hearing, and requested that confidentiality of the hearing be written into the final regulations.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support for this provision, requiring postsecondary institutions to hold live hearings. The Department agrees that a live hearing gives both parties the most meaningful, transparent opportunity to present their views of the case to the decision-maker, reducing the likelihood of biased decisions, improving the accuracy of outcomes, and increasing party and public confidence in the fairness and reliability of outcomes of Title IX adjudications.

The Department agrees with commenters that hearings and cross-examination of witnesses are deeply rooted concepts in American legal systems, but disagrees that the principles underlying those procedures should be absent from postsecondary institutions' adjudications under Title IX. Administrative law ''seeks to ensure that those whose rights are affected by the decisions of administrative tribunals are given notice of hearings, guaranteed an oral, often public hearing, have a right to be represented, are granted disclosure of the case against them, are able to introduce evidence, call witnesses and cross-examine those testifying against them, have access to reason for decision, and an opportunity to appeal an adverse outcome. . . . The process assumes the value of an adversarial hearing in which impartial adjudicators are exposed to representations from those asserting a claim and those seeking a contrary finding.'' [1370] Furthermore, while not all recipients use a hearing model in student misconduct matters, many do or have in the recent past.[1371]

The Department agrees that postsecondary institutions are not equipped to act as courts of law. The final regulations acknowledge this reality by prescribing a grievance process that intentionally avoids importation of comprehensive rules of procedure (including discovery procedures) and rules of evidence that govern civil or criminal court trials. Instead, the § 106.45 grievance process requires procedures rooted in fundamental concepts of due process and fairness that layperson recipient officials are capable of applying without professional legal training. The Department disagrees that live hearings transform Title IX adjudications into court proceedings; the advantages to reaching determinations about sex discrimination in the form of sexual harassment without going through a civil or criminal trial remain distinct under the final regulations.

The Department disagrees that live hearings add no value to the fairness or accuracy of outcomes even where an investigation was full and fair. Despite some commenters' contention that recipients prefer moving to an investigative model rather than a hearing model, the Department believes that an adversarial adjudication model better serves the interests of fairness, accuracy, and legitimacy that underlie the § 106.45 grievance process.

The adversarial system ''stands with freedom of speech and the right of assembly as a pillar of our constitutional system.'' [1372] Just as the final regulations reflect acute awareness of the importance of freedom of speech and academic freedom, these regulations are equally concerned with reflecting the importance of the adversarial model with respect to adjudications of contested facts. ''Rights like trial by jury and the assistance of counsel—the cluster of rights that comprise constitutional due process of law—are most important when the individual stands alone against the state as an accused criminal. The fundamental characteristics of the adversary system also have a constitutional source, however, in our administration of civil justice'' to redress grievances, resolve conflicts, and vindicate rights.[1373] ''The Supreme Court has held that the Due Process Clauses protect civil litigants who seek recourse in the courts, either as plaintiffs attempting to redress grievances or as defendants trying to maintain their rights.'' [1374] The final regulations recognize the importance of due process principles in a noncriminal context by focusing on procedures that apply equally to complainants and respondents and give both parties equal opportunity to actively pursue the case outcome they desire.

In addition to representing core constitutional values, an adversarial system yields practical benefits. ''[T]he available evidence suggests that the adversary system is the method of dispute resolution that is most effective in determining truth'' and that ''gives the parties the greatest sense of having received justice.'' [1375] ''An adversary presentation seems the only effective means for combating this natural human tendency to judge too swiftly in terms of the familiar that which is not yet fully known.'' [1376] With respect to ''the idea of individual autonomy—that each of us should have the greatest possible involvement in, if not control over, those decisions that affect our lives in significant ways [—] . . . empirical studies that have been done suggest, again, a preference for the adversary system over the inquisitorial.'' During the course of the hearing, the decisionmaker acts only to contain the colloquy within the bounds of the actual dispute. Studies conducted to determine ''whether a litigant's acceptance of the fairness of the actual decision is affected by the litigation system used'' have concluded that ''the perception of the fairness of an adversary procedure carries over to create a more favorable reaction to the verdict . . . regardless of the outcome.'' [1378] As to commenters' contention that moving to an investigatory rather than hearing model resulted in increased reporting of sexual harassment, the Department emphasizes that the final regulations ensure that every complainant may report and receive supportive measures without undergoing an investigation or adjudication.[1379]

The Department does not dispute that other countries rely on an inquisitorial rather than adversarial model of adjudication, but Title IX is a Federal civil rights statute representing the American value placed on education programs and activities free from sex discrimination, and Title IX must be applied and interpreted in accordance with American law rather than laws and systems that prevail elsewhere.[1380] While commenters cited research studies calling into doubt the truth-seeking effectiveness of the adversarial process and calling for reforms including moving toward inquisitorial models, the adversarial system remains deeply embedded in the U.S. Constitution and in American legal systems and civic values, and ''the research that has been done provides no justification for preferring the inquisitorial search for truth or for undertaking radical changes in our adversary system.'' [1381]

The Department appreciates commenters' concerns that based on experience holding hearings, a hearing model was abandoned by particular recipients in favor of an investigatory model, but the Department disagrees that properly conducted hearings will become a springboard to introduce new evidence, derail hearings by embarrassing the parties, or require hearing panels to seek out extensive legal advice. The Department reiterates that recipients may adopt rules to govern a Title IX grievance process in addition to those required under § 106.45, so long as such rules apply equally to both parties.[1382] Thus, recipients may decide whether or how to place limits on evidence introduced at a hearing that was not gathered and presented prior to the hearing, and rules controlling the conduct of participants to ensure that questioning is done in a respectful manner. The Department reiterates that the procedures in § 106.45 have been selected with awareness that decision-makers in Title IX grievance processes need not be judges or lawyers, and the Department believes that each provision of these final regulations may be complied with and applied by layperson recipient officials.

The Department does not dispute that decision-makers are capable of being impartial and unbiased without the parties appearing at a live hearing, and the final regulations expect that decision-makers will serve impartially without bias. However, adversarial procedures make it even less likely that any bias held by a decision-maker will prevail because the parties' own views about the evidence are presented to the decision-maker, and the decision-maker observes the parties as individuals which makes it more difficult to apply even unconsciously-held stereotypes or generalizations about groups of people.

The Department agrees that a variety of administrative agency proceedings have been declared by courts to comport with constitutional due process utilizing procedures less formal than those that apply in criminal or even civil courts. The Department believes that the procedures embodied in the § 106.45 grievance process meet or exceed constitutional due process of law, while being adapted for application with respect to an education program or activity, and do not mirror civil or criminal trials.

The Department realizes that witnesses with information relevant to sexual harassment allegations that involve the witness's friends or co-students may feel disinclined to provide information during an investigation, and perhaps more so at a live hearing. However, the importance of both parties' opportunity to present and challenge evidence—particularly witness statements—requires that a witness make statements in front of the decision-maker, with both parties' advisors able to cross-examine. This does not permit parties to coerce witnesses into appearing at a hearing. No person should coerce or intimidate any witness into participating in a Title IX proceeding, and § 106.71(a) protects every individual's right not to participate free from retaliation.

The final regulations, and the live hearing requirement in particular, benefit complainants and respondents equally by granting both parties the same rights and specifying the same consequences for lack of participation. The safety of complainants can be addressed in numerous ways consistent with these final regulations, including holding the hearing virtually, having the parties in separate rooms, imposing no-contact orders on the parties, and allowing advisors of choice to accompany parties to the hearing. For the reasons described above, the Department believes that the final regulations balance the pendulum rather than swing the pendulum too far, in terms of balancing the rights of both parties in a contested sexual harassment situation to pursue their respective desires regarding the case outcome.

The Department believes that the time and resources recipients have spent over the past several years developing non-hearing adjudication models can largely be applied to a recipient's obligations under these final regulations. For example, recipients who have developed thorough and fair investigative processes may continue to conduct such investigations. The benefits of a full, fair investigation will continue to be an important part of the § 106.45 grievance process. Even though postsecondary institutions will reach actual determinations regarding responsibility after holding a live hearing, the time and resources dedicated to developing recipients' current systems will largely carry over into compliance with the final regulations.

Although decided under the Sixth Amendment's Confrontation Clause which only applies to criminal trials, the Supreme Court analyzed the history of American legal systems' insistence that adversarial procedures rooted in English common law (as opposed to inquisitorial procedures utilized by civil law countries in Europe) represented fundamental notions of due process of law, and American founders deliberately rejected devices that English common law borrowed from civil law.

[1382] The introductory sentence of revised § 106.45(b) provides: ''For the purpose of addressing formal complaints of sexual harassment, a recipient's grievance process must comply with the requirements of this section. Any provisions, rules, or practices other than those required by this section that a recipient adopts as part of its grievance process for handling formal complaints of sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, must apply equally to both parties.'' to admit responsibility, or where both parties want to resolve the case without a completed investigation or adjudication, § 106.45(b)(9) allows a recipient to facilitate an informal resolution of the formal complaint that does not necessitate a full investigation or adjudication.[1383] As noted above, even if no party appears for the live hearing such that no party's statements can be relied on by the decision-maker, it is still possible to reach a determination regarding responsibility where non-statement evidence has been gathered and presented to the decision-maker. Commenters' descriptions of an administrative disposition model, or a proposed voluntary resolution agreement, are permissible under the final regulations if applied as part of an informal resolution process in conformity with § 106.45(b)(9), which requires both parties' written, voluntary consent to the informal process. The Department declines to authorize one or both parties, or the recipient, simply to ''waive'' a live hearing, and § 106.45(b)(9) in the final regulations impresses upon recipients that a recipient cannot condition enrollment, employment, or any other right on the waiver of rights under § 106.45, nor may a recipient ever require parties to participate in an informal resolution process. Participating in mediation, which is a form of informal resolution, should remain a decision for each party, individually, to make in a particular case, and the Department will not require the parties to attempt mediation.

The Department appreciates commenters' concerns that State APAs may prescribe grievance procedures that differ from those in a § 106.45 grievance process. To the extent that a recipient is able to comply with both, it must do so, and if compliance with both is not possible these final regulations, which constitute Federal law, preempt conflicting State law.[1384] The Department cautions, however, that preemption may not be necessary where, for example, a State law requires fewer procedures than do these final regulations, such that a recipient complying with § 106.45 is not violating State law but rather providing more or greater procedures than State law requires. To the extent that recipients find hearings under State APAs to be burdensome, the Department contends that the value of hearings outweighs such burdens, a policy judgment ostensibly shared by State legislatures that already require recipients to hold hearings.

The Department generally does not disagree with the general propositions set forth in the Federal district court memorandum cited by commenters to explain that college discipline differs from Federal criminal processes.[1385] The Department observes that the memorandum notes that ''Only where erroneous and unwise actions in the field of education deprive students of federally protected rights or privileges does a federal court have power to intervene in the educational process.'' [1386] These final regulations precisely protect the rights and privileges owed to every person participating in an education program or activity under Title IX, a Federal civil rights law. In so doing, these final regulations reflect that a Title IX grievance process is not a criminal proceeding and defer to all recipients (public and private institutions) to make their own decisions within a consistent, predictable framework.

In response to commenters' concerns that the NPRM was unclear about the extent of recipients' discretion to adopt rules and practices to govern the conduct of hearings (and other aspects of a grievance process) the Department has added to the introductory sentence of § 106.45(b): ''Any provisions, rules, or practices other than those required by § 106.45 that a recipient adopts as part of its grievance process for handling formal complaints of sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, must apply equally to both parties.'' Under this provision a recipient may, for instance, adopt rules that instruct party advisors to conduct questioning in a respectful, non-abusive manner, decide whether the parties may offer opening or closing statements, specify a process for making objections to the relevance of questions and evidence, place reasonable time limitations on a hearing, and so forth. The Department declines to require recipients to offer ''mitigating measures'' during hearings in addition to the shielding provision in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) that requires a recipient to allow parties to participate in the live hearing in separate rooms upon any party's request. Similarly, recipients may adopt evidentiary rules (that also must apply equally to both parties), but any such rules must comport with all provisions in § 106.45, such as the obligation to summarize all relevant evidence in an investigative report, the obligation to evaluate all relevant evidence both inculpatory and exculpatory, the right of parties to gather and present evidence including fact and expert witnesses, the right to pose relevant cross-examination questions, and the rape shield provisions that deem sexual behavior evidence irrelevant subject to two exceptions. Thus, a recipient's additional evidentiary rules may not, for example, exclude relevant cross-examination questions even if the recipient believes the questions assume facts not in evidence or are misleading. In response to commenters' concerns that relevant questions might implicate information protected by attorney-client privilege, the final regulations add § 106.45(b)(1)(x) to bar the grievance process from requiring, allowing, relying on, or otherwise using questions or evidence that constitute, or seek disclosure of, information protected under a legally recognized privilege. This bar on information protected under a legally recognized privilege applies at all stages of the § 106.45 grievance process, including but not limited to the investigator's gathering of evidence, inspection and review of evidence, investigative report, and the hearing. This protection of privileged information also applies to a privilege held by a recipient. Additionally, questions that are duplicative or repetitive may fairly be deemed not relevant and thus excluded.

In response to commenters' concerns that holding live hearings is administratively time-consuming and presents challenges coordinating the schedules of all participants, the Department has revised this provision to allow a recipient discretion to conduct hearings virtually, facilitated by technology so participants simultaneously see and hear each other. The Department appreciates the concerns of commenters that some recipients operate programs or activities that are difficult to access via road systems and are in remote locations where technology is not accessible or reliable. The final regulations permit a recipient to apply temporary delays or limited extensions of time frames to all phases of a grievance process where good cause exists. For example, the need for parties, witnesses, and other hearing participants to secure transportation, or for the recipient to troubleshoot technology to facilitate a virtual hearing, may constitute good cause to postpone a hearing.

The Department is persuaded by commenters' suggestions that all hearings should be recorded or transcribed, and has revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to require recipients to create an audio or audiovisual recording, or transcript, of any live hearing and make that recording or transcript available to the parties for inspection and review. As the commenters asserted, such a recording or transcript will help any party who wishes to file an appeal pursuant to § 106.45(b)(8) and also will reinforce the requirement that a decision-maker not have a bias for or against complainants or respondents generally or an individual complainant or respondent as set forth in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii).

The Department appreciates the opportunity to clarify here that hearings under § 106.45(b)(6) are not ''public'' hearings, and § 106.71(a) states that recipients must keep confidential the identity of any individual who has made a report or complaint of sex discrimination, including any individual who has made a report or filed a formal complaint of sexual harassment, any complainant, any individual who has been reported to be the perpetrator of sex discrimination, any respondent, and any witness, except as permitted by the FERPA statute or regulations, 20 U.S.C. 1232g and 34 CFR part 99, or as required by law, or as necessary to conduct the hearing.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to add language authorizing recipients to conduct live hearings virtually, specifically providing that live hearings pursuant to this subsection may be conducted with all parties physically present in the same geographic location, or at the recipient's discretion, any or all parties, witnesses, and other participants may appear at the live hearing virtually, with technology enabling participants simultaneously to see and hear each other. We have also revised this provision so that upon a party's request the parties must be in separate rooms for the live hearing, and not only for cross-examination. We have also revised § 106.45(b)(6)(i) to add a requirement that recipients create an audio or audiovisual recording, or transcript, of any live hearing held and make the recording or transcript available to the parties for inspection and review.

Additionally, we have revised the introductory sentence of § 106.45(b) to provide that any provisions, rules, or practices other than those required by § 106.45 that a recipient adopts as part of its grievance process for handling formal complaints of sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, must apply equally to both parties.

We have revised § 106.45(b)(9) to provide that a recipient may not require as a condition of enrollment or continuing enrollment, or employment or continuing employment, or enjoyment of any other right, waiver of the right to an investigation and adjudication of formal complaints of sexual harassment consistent with § 106.45. We have also added § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation and stating that recipients must keep confidential the identity of any individual who has made a report or complaint of sex discrimination, including any individual who has made a report or filed a formal complaint of sexual harassment, any complainant, any individual who has been reported to be the perpetrator of sex discrimination, any respondent, and any witness, except as may be permitted by the FERPA statute or regulations, 20 U.S.C. 1232g and 34 CFR part 99, or as required by law, or to carry out the purposes of 34 CFR part 106, including these final regulations.

Finally, we have added § 106.45(b)(1)(x) to bar the grievance process from requiring, allowing, relying on, or otherwise using questions or evidence that constitute, or seek disclosure of, information protected under a legally recognized privilege.

Section 106.45(b)(6)(ii) Elementary and Secondary School Recipients May Require Hearing and Must Have Opportunity To Submit Written Questions

Comments: Many commenters supported § 106.45(b)(6)(ii), making hearings optional for elementary and secondary schools and prescribing a right for parties to submit written questions to other parties and witnesses prior to a determination regarding responsibility whether a hearing is held or not. Commenters asserted that high school students deserve due process protections as much as college students, and believed that this provision provides adequate due process in elementary and secondary schools while taking into account that students in elementary and secondary schools are usually under the age of majority.

Other commenters recounted personal experiences with family members being accused of sexual misconduct as high school students and argued that the required live hearings with cross-examination in § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) should also apply in high schools.

Some commenters asserted that this provision should be modified to require live hearings and cross-examination in elementary and secondary schools, but only for peer-on-peer sexual harassment allegations; commenters argued that this level of due process was more consistent with Goss and Mathews [1387] and where the allegations involve peers, the parties are on equal footing such that a hearing will effectively reduce risk of erroneous outcomes.

Commenters requested that this provision be modified to expressly state that live hearings are not required in elementary and secondary schools, instead of the phrasing that the grievance process ''may require a live hearing.''

Commenters called the written question process in this provision appropriately fair, flexible, and trauma-informed, and consistent with recommendations in the withdrawn 2011 Dear Colleague Letter. Commenters asserted that this provision, more so than § 106.45(b)(6)(i), balances the potential benefits of cross-examination with the drawbacks of a live hearing, including the chilling effect on complainants, the significant cost to recipients, and the potential for errors and poor spur-of-the-moment judgment calls in a setting with critically high stakes. Many commenters approved of this provision and urged the Department to make it apply also to postsecondary institutions in replacement of § 106.45(b)(6)(i) under which live hearings and cross-examination are required.

Some commenters opposed this provision, asserting that even a written form of cross-examination exposes elementary and secondary school students to unnecessarily hostile proceedings and limits the discretion of local educators who are more knowledgeable about their students and school communities, obligating schools to expend valuable resources in an unwarranted manner. Commenters argued that this provision would allow five year old students (or their parents or advisors) to face off against other five year old students about the veracity of allegations with written questions and responses being exchanged. Commenters argued this is inappropriate because it does not take into account how to obtain information from young children or students with disabilities, creates an air of intimidation and potential revictimization, allows confidential information to be shared with ''countless individuals'' whereas an appeal could address concerns about the investigation without sharing FERPA-protected information, and formal discipline proceedings involving potential exclusion of a public school student are already subject to State laws giving sufficient due process protections to an accused student.

Commenters argued that in elementary and secondary schools, a formal investigation process is not always needed or advisable because often State law may require school interventions prior to when exclusionary discipline is considered. Commenters argued that this provision perpetuates America's patriarchal culture that already does not believe survivors, because this provision allows survivors to be questioned when we do not question someone who goes to the police and says they were robbed or someone who reports being hit by a car, so questioning sexual assault victims just gives perpetrators a chance to terrorize the victim again and fails to convey to the victim respect, belief, or justice.

Commenters asserted that this provision essentially provides the non-hearing equivalent of cross-examination via the written submission of questions, but argued this will be difficult for elementary and secondary school officials to implement without significant legal guidance because the purpose of cross-examination is to judge credibility and officials will not know how to accomplish that purpose. Commenters argued it is unclear how many back-and-forth follow-up questions need to be allowed in this ''quasi-cross examination process'' and asserted that this process will result in even greater hesitation among classmates to offer information about the parties involved, because peer pressure looks different among susceptible children and adolescents than with college-age students and already works against ''tattling'' or ''ratting'' on fellow students. Commenters expressed concern that the written ''cross-examination'' procedure will delay the ability of schools to timely respond to sexual harassment complaints, that this procedure is not already in use by schools, and that a cycle of written questions at the end of already overly formal, prescribed procedures will only serve to extend the time frame for completing investigations impairing an elementary and secondary school recipient's ability to effectuate meaningful change to student behavior if the behavior is found to be misconduct.

Commenters opposed this provision and urged the Department to remove the option for live hearings, because even permitting elementary and secondary schools the discretion to hold live hearings adds the possibility of a new layer to the investigative process that could subject a young student to cross-examination, which would intimidate and retraumatize victims.[1388] Commenters argued that research has consistently shown the extreme importance of handling investigations and interviews properly when dealing with childhood sexual abuse situations, that subjecting child victims of sexual abuse to multiple interviews is re-traumatizing and that the interview process should be conducted with an interdisciplinary team and trained mental health professionals utilizing trauma-informed practices, yet § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) would allow school administrators to ignore all of these best practices that are in the interest of protecting young victims,[1389] subjecting abused children to secondary victimization.[1390]

Commenters argued that the Supreme Court has held, even in the criminal law context, that a State's interest in protecting child abuse victims outweighs an accused's constitutional right to face-to-face confrontation of witnesses.[1391] Commenters argued that child sexual abuse is far too common an experience among America's schoolchildren, and teachers, counselors, and principals have no training in, and are not, forensic interviewers, criminal investigators, judges, or evidence technicians, and thus no school district should even be allowed to choose a live hearing model for sexual misconduct allegations. Commenters stated that live hearings place a sharp spotlight on both parties, and students in elementary and secondary schools typically lack the maturity necessary to participate. Commenters argued that live hearings should not even be optional in elementary and secondary schools because it is difficult to imagine any positive effects of a respondent's attorney cross-examining a sixth grader alleging sexual harassment at school or a complainant's attorney cross-examining the alleged perpetrator. Commenters argued that live hearings should only be allowed for elementary and secondary schools if otherwise required under State law. Commenters stated that if live hearings are even an option, school districts will be inundated with requests to hold adversarial live hearings.

Commenters asked for clarity as to which circumstances require an elementary and secondary school recipient to hold a live hearing, who would preside over a hearing, whether the hearing would need to be held on school grounds, and what responsibility the school district would have to mitigate re-traumatization, or whether if a school district opts to hold live hearings all the provisions in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) would then apply.

Commenters inquired whether a vocational school that is neither an elementary or secondary school, nor an institution of higher education, would have to follow § 106.45(b)(6)(i), § 106.45(b)(6)(ii), or some other process for Title IX adjudications.

Commenters suggested that this provision be modified to state that a minor has the right for a parent to help the minor student pose questions and answer questions but that the parent (or advisor) is not allowed to write the questions or answers without input from the minor student; commenters reasoned that it would be unfair if a respondent was an adult capable of strategically posing questions while a minor complainant lacked the developmental ability to do the same. Other commenters argued that written submission of questions by the parties should never be allowed in the elementary and secondary school context because the procedure is likely to devolve into a fight between the parents of the complainant and parents of the respondent, further traumatizing both children involved.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support for § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) making hearings optional for elementary and secondary schools while providing opportunity for the parties to submit written questions and follow-up questions to other parties and witnesses with or without a hearing. The Department agrees that this provision ensures due process protections and fairness while taking into account that students in elementary and secondary schools are usually under the age of majority. Thus, the Department declines to mandate hearings and cross-examination for elementary and secondary schools, including only as applied to allegations of peer-on-peer harassment, or to high schools. Even where the parties are in a peer age group, parties in elementary and secondary schools generally are not adults with the developmental ability and legal right to pursue their own interests on par with adults. The Department is persuaded by commenters' concerns that the language in this provision should state even more clearly that hearings are optional and not required, and has revised this provision to state that ''the recipient's grievance process may, but need not, provide for a hearing.'' For the reasons explained in the ''Section 106.45(b)(6)(i) Postsecondary Institution Recipients Must Provide Live Hearing with Cross-Examination'' subsection of the ''Hearings'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble, the Department declines to make § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) applicable to postsecondary institutions.

The Department disagrees that the written submission of questions procedure in this provision exposes students to hostile proceedings, unnecessarily limits the discretion of local school officials, or obligates school districts to expend resources in an unwarranted manner. While due process of law is a flexible concept, at a minimum it requires notice and a meaningful opportunity to be heard, and the Department has determined that with respect to sexual harassment allegations under Title IX, both parties deserve procedural protections that translate those due process principles into meaningful rights for parties and increase the likelihood of reliable outcomes. This provision prescribes written submission of questions prior to adjudication, a procedure that benefits the truth-seeking purpose of the process even when the rights of a young student are exercised by a parent or legal guardian.

The final regulations do not preclude a recipient from providing training to an investigator concerning effective interview techniques applicable to children or to individuals with disabilities. Even when a party's rights are being exercised by a parent, each party's interest in the case is best advanced when the parties have the right to review and present evidence; the Department disagrees that the § 106.45 grievance process results in confidential information being shared with ''countless individuals'' or in violation of FERPA.[1392] Section 106.71 directs recipients to keep confidential the identity of any individual who has made a report or complaint of sex discrimination, including any individual who has made a report or filed a formal complaint of sexual harassment, any complainant, any individual who has been reported to be the perpetrator of sex discrimination, any respondent, and any witness, except as may be permitted by the FERPA statute or regulations, 20 U.S.C. 1232g and 34 CFR part 99, or as required by law, or to carry out the purposes of 34 CFR part 106, including these final regulations.

The Department appreciates commenters' concerns that State laws already govern disciplinary proceedings, especially with respect to exclusionary discipline. The Department has determined that the procedural protections in § 106.45 best serve the interests implicated in resolution of allegations of sexual harassment under Title IX, a Federal civil rights law, and discipline for non-Title IX matters does not fall under the purview of these final regulations. To the extent that these final regulations provide the same protections as State laws governing student discipline already provide, these final regulations pose no challenge for recipients; to the extent that a recipient cannot comply with both State law and these final regulations, these final regulations, as Federal law, would control.[1393]

The Department disputes a commenter's contention that only sexual assault survivors are ''questioned'' when they report being assaulted; contrary to the commenter's assertion, robbery victims and hit-and-run victims are also ''questioned'' during criminal or civil proceedings. Similarly, students accused of cheating also are often questioned. Whether or not commenters accurately describe American culture as ''patriarchal,'' the Department believes that these final regulations further the sex-equality mandate of Title IX by ensuring fair, accurate determinations regarding responsibility where sexual harassment is alleged under Title IX, so that sexual harassment victims receive remedies from recipients to promote equal educational access.

The Department disagrees that this provision will require significant legal guidance for school officials to comply. The provision gives each party the opportunity to submit written questions to be asked of other parties and witnesses, including limited follow-up questions. The decision-maker then objectively evaluates the answers to such questions, and any other relevant evidence gathered and presented during the investigation and reaches a determination regarding responsibility. Although observing demeanor is not possible without live cross-examination, a decision-maker may still judge credibility based on, for example, factors of plausibility and consistency in party and witness statements. Specialized legal training is not a prerequisite for evaluating credibility, as evidenced by the fact that many criminal and civil court trials rely on jurors (for whom no legal training is required) to determine the facts of the case including the credibility of witnesses.

This provision requires ''limited follow-up questions'' and leaves recipients discretion to set reasonable limits in that regard. The Department understands commenters' concerns that witnesses face peer pressure in many sexual harassment situations, and that stating factual information may be viewed as ''tattling'' or ''ratting out'' friends or fellow students which may be very uncomfortable for witnesses. Nothing in these final regulations purports to authorize recipients to compel witness participation in a grievance process, and § 106.71(a) protects every individual from retaliation for participating or refusing to participate in a Title IX proceeding.

The Department understands commenters' concerns that the written submission of questions procedure in § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) may be a new procedure in elementary and secondary schools, and the concern that such a procedure may create a ''cycle'' that extends the time frame for concluding a grievance process. To clarify that the written submission of questions procedure need not delay conclusion of the grievance process, we have revised § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) to state that the opportunity for each party to submit written questions to other parties and witnesses must take place after the parties are sent the investigative report, and before the determination regarding responsibility is reached. Because § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) gives the parties ten days [1394] to submit a response to the investigative report, this revision to § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) makes it clear that the written submission of questions procedure may overlap with that ten-day period, so that the written questions procedure need not extend the time frame of the grievance process.

In order to leave school districts as much flexibility as possible while creating a consistent, predictable grievance process framework, the Department declines to foreclose the option of holding hearings (whether ''live'' or otherwise) in elementary and secondary schools. Local school officials, for example, could determine that their educational community is best served by holding live hearings for high school students, for students above a certain age, or not at all.[1395] State law may prescribe hearings for school discipline matters, in which case by leaving hearings optional these final regulations makes a conflict with State laws less likely. Further, the final regulations clarify that this provision applies not only to elementary and secondary schools but also to any other recipient that is not a postsecondary institution, and the nature of such a recipient's operations may lead such a recipient to desire a hearing model for adjudications. For these reasons the final regulations leave hearings optional regardless of whether State law requires hearings. The Department understands commenters' concerns that if hearings are an option, school districts may become ''inundated'' with requests to hold hearings. The Department reiterates that this provision does not require elementary or secondary schools to use hearings (live or otherwise) to adjudicate formal complaints under Title IX, and any choice to do so remains within a recipient's discretion.

As noted above, nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient from training investigators in best practices for interviewing children, and the final regulations minimize the number of times a young victim might have to be interviewed, by not requiring appearances at live hearings. The Department understands that school officials are not forensic or criminal investigation experts, and recognizes that in many situations, conduct that constitutes sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30 will also constitute sexual abuse resulting in law enforcement investigations. These final regulations contemplate the intersection of a recipient's investigation under Title IX with concurrent law enforcement activity, expressly stating that good cause may exist to temporarily delay the Title IX grievance process to coordinate or cooperate with a concurrent law enforcement investigation. The Department disagrees that these final regulations require schools to disregard best practices with respect to interviewing child sex abuse victims and reiterate that the final regulations do not preclude a recipient from training Title IX personnel in interview techniques sensitive to the unique needs of traumatized children.

If an elementary and secondary school recipient chooses to hold a hearing (live or otherwise), this provision leaves the recipient significant discretion as to how to conduct such a hearing, because § 106.45(b)(6)(i) applies only to postsecondary institutions. The Department desires to leave elementary and secondary schools as much flexibility as possible to apply procedures that fit the needs of the recipient's educational environment. The Department notes that § 106.45(b) requires any rules adopted by a recipient for use in a Title IX grievance process, other than those required under § 106.45, must apply equally to both parties. Within that restriction, elementary and secondary school recipients retain discretion to decide how to conduct hearings if a recipient selects that option.

In response to commenters wondering whether hearings are optional or required for a recipient that is neither a postsecondary institution nor an elementary and secondary school, the Department has revised § 106.30 to define ''postsecondary institution'' and ''elementary and secondary school'' and clarify that § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) applies to elementary and secondary schools and any ''other recipient that is not a postsecondary institution.''

In response to commenters concerned about whether a minor party has the right to have a parent help pose questions and answers under this provision, we have added § 106.6(g) to clarify that nothing in these regulations changes or limits the legal rights of parents or guardians to act on behalf of a party. The Department declines to specify whether a parent writing out questions or answers on behalf of the student-party must consult their child; this matter is addressed by other laws concerning the scope of a parent's legal right to act on behalf of their child. The Department understands commenters' concerns that the written submission of questions procedure may ''devolve into a fight'' between parents of minor parties, but reiterates that recipients retain discretion to adopt rules of decorum that, for example, require questions to be posed in a respectful manner (e.g., without using profanity or irrelevant ad hominem attacks). Further, the decision-maker has the obligation to permit only relevant questions to be asked and must explain to the party posing the question any decision to exclude a question as not relevant.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) to clarify that it applies to elementary and secondary schools and to ''other recipients that are not postsecondary institutions,'' and to clarify that ''the recipient's grievance process may, but need not, provide for, a hearing.'' We have further revised § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) to provide that, with or without a hearing, after the recipient has sent the investigative report to the parties pursuant to § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) and before reaching a determination regarding responsibility, the decision-maker(s) must afford each party the opportunity to submit written, relevant questions that a party wants asked of any party or witness, provide each party with the answers, and allow for additional, limited follow-up questions from each party.

We have added definitions of ''elementary and secondary schools'' and ''postsecondary institutions'' in § 106.30. We have also added § 106.6(g) acknowledging that nothing in these final regulations abrogates the legal rights of parents or guardians to act on behalf of party. We have added § 106.71 directing recipients to keep confidential the identity of any individual who has made a report or complaint of sex discrimination, including any individual who has made a report or filed a formal complaint of sexual harassment, any complainant, any individual who has been reported to be the perpetrator of sex discrimination, any respondent, and any witness, except [1394] As noted in the ''Other Language/Terminology Comments'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble, the final regulations allow recipients to choose how to calculate ''days'' as used in these final regulations; a recipient may, for instance, calculate a ten-day period by calendar days, school days, business days, or other method.

[1395] The Department notes that this provision states that non-postsecondary institution recipients' grievance processes may, but need not, provide for a hearing. Therefore, the recipient has flexibility to make a hearing available on a case by case basis, for example where the Title IX Coordinator determines a hearing is needed, so long as the grievance process (of which the recipient's students and employees receive notice, pursuant to § 106.8) clearly identifies the circumstances under which a hearing may, or may not, be held. A recipient's discretion in this regard is limited by the introductory sentence in § 106.45(b) that any rules adopted by a recipient must apply equally to both parties. Thus, a recipient's grievance process could not, for example, state that a hearing will be held only if a respondent requests it, or only if a complainant agrees to it, but could state that a hearing will be held only if both parties request it or consent to it.

as may be permitted by the FERPA statute or regulations, 20 U.S.C. 1232g and 34 CFR part 99, or as required by law, or to carry out the purposes of 34 CFR part 106, including these final regulations.

Comments: Some commenters supported or opposed the rape shield protections in § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) for the same reasons stated in support of or opposition to the same language in § 106.45(b)(6)(ii); see discussion under the ''Section 106.45(b)(6)(i) Postsecondary Institution Recipients Must Provide Live Hearings with Cross-Examination'' subsection of the ''Hearings'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble.

Some commenters argued that the two exceptions should be eliminated with respect to minors because the sexual behavior of children should never be relevant or asked about or because minors cannot legally consent and thus an exception where ''offered to prove consent'' serves no purpose with respect to minors.

Discussion: The Department's incorporates here its response to commenters' support and opposition for the rape shield language stated in the ''Section 106.45(b)(6)(i) Postsecondary Institution Recipients Must Provide Live Hearings with Cross-Examination'' subsection of the ''Hearings'' subsection of ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble.

The Department disagrees that the two exceptions (or even the exception that refers to ''consent'') should be eliminated in this provision because minors cannot legally consent to sexual activity. While this fact may make the issue of ''consent'' irrelevant in certain sexual harassment cases, consent may be relevant in other formal complaints investigated and adjudicated by elementary and secondary school recipients; for example, where the parties are over the age of consent in the relevant jurisdiction, or the age difference between the two minor parties is such that State law decriminalizes consensual sexual activity between the two individuals.[1396] The Department will defer to State law regarding the age when a person has the ability to consent. Further, we have revised this provision in the final regulations to clarify that it applies not only to elementary and secondary schools but also to other recipients that are not postsecondary institutions, and parties associated with such ''other recipients'' may be adults rather than children. The Department thus retains the rape shield language in this provision, including the two exceptions, mirroring the rape shield language used in § 106.45(b)(6)(i).

Changes: For the same reasons as discussed under § 106.45(b)(6)(i), the Department has revised the rape shield language in § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) by clarifying that questions and evidence about the complainant's prior sexual behavior or predisposition are not relevant unless such questions or evidence are offered for one of the two exceptions (offered to prove someone other than the respondent committed the alleged conduct, or offered to prove consent).

Comments: Some commenters supported or opposed the requirement in § 106.45(b)(6)(ii) that decision-makers explain the reason for excluding any question proposed by a party as not relevant, for the same reasons stated in support or opposition for similar language in § 106.45(b)(6)(i); see discussion under the ''Section 106.45(b)(6)(i) Postsecondary Institution Recipients Must Provide Live Hearings with Cross-Examination'' subsection of the ''Hearings'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble.

Some commenters opposed this requirement because it would essentially force an elementary and secondary school administrator to make evidentiary determinations that can be difficult even for lawyers and judges. Commenters opposed this requirement based on personal experience handling questions from minor parties and their parents in Title IX proceedings and observing that many questions posed by parents are irrelevant, so having to explain the relevance of each excluded question would draw out the length of proceedings unnecessarily.

Discussion: The Department incorporates here its response to commenters' support of and opposition to the similar provision in § 106.45(b)(6)(i) under which the decision-maker must explain any decision to exclude questions as not relevant; see the ''Section 106.45(b)(6)(i) Postsecondary Institution Recipients Must Provide Live Hearings with Cross-Examination'' subsection of the ''Hearings'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble.

The Department appreciates commenters' concerns that based on experience with parents exercising rights on behalf of students during Title IX proceedings, parents tend to pose a lot of irrelevant questions. The Department believes the burden of this requirement is outweighed by the right of parties (including when a party's rights are exercised by parents) to meaningfully participate in the grievance process through posing questions to the other party and witnesses, and understanding why a question has been deemed irrelevant is important to ensure that the parties feel confident that their perspectives about the facts and evidence are appropriately taken into account prior to the determination regarding responsibility being reached.

Determinations Regarding Responsibility

Section 106.45(b)(7)(i) Single Investigator Model Prohibited

Benefits of Ending the Single Investigator Model

Comments: Many commenters supported the NPRM's prohibition on the single investigator model because it would reduce the risk of bias and unfairness. Commenters argued that ending the single investigator model would decentralize power from one individual, allow for checks and balances, reduce the risk of confirmation bias, and increase the overall fairness and reliability of Title IX proceedings. Commenters stated that a strict separation of investigative and decision-making functions is essential because it is unrealistic to expect a person to fairly review their own investigative work. One commenter argued that procedural protections are necessary but not sufficient to render fair outcomes; the commenter stated it is also necessary to prohibit, detect, and eliminate bias. The commenter argued that unbiased adjudicators are a bedrock principle of any disciplinary proceeding, and this principle has been well understood since the founding of this country and development of the common law.[1397] Several commenters asserted that schools are currently facing significant pressure from the media and general public to achieve ''social justice'' and find respondents guilty. Commenters argued that blending the investigative and adjudicative functions increases the risk of false positives (i.e., inaccurate findings of responsibility).

Madison) (''No man is allowed to be a judge in his own cause; because his interest would certainly bias his judgment, and, not improbably, corrupt his integrity.''). At least one commenter cited: Caperton v. A.T. Massey Coal Co., Inc., 556 U.S. 868, 867, 877 (2009) (common law recognized the need for unbiased adjudicators, and the U.S. Constitution incorporated and expanded upon the protections at common law against biased adjudicators).

Several commenters submitted personal stories where investigators under the single investigator model acted improperly, for instance by meeting with complainants but not respondents, failing to promptly notify the respondent of charges, withholding evidence, ignoring exculpatory evidence, ignoring inconsistencies in complainant's testimony, framing language in an inflammatory way against the respondent, relying on triple hearsay favoring the complainant, and entering a suspected personal relationship with the complainant. Commenters stated that improper or biased actions by an investigator might at least be recognized and corrected where the decision-maker is a different person. A few commenters asserted that ending the single investigator model would reinforce a genuine live hearing process with cross-examination. One commenter suggested that the single investigator model precludes effective confrontation of witnesses because even where there is a live hearing the investigator's finding is a ''heavy thumb on the scale.'' Commenters noted that under the single investigator model often there is no live hearing at all where parties can probe each other's credibility, and no opportunity for parties to know what evidence the investigator is considering before rendering an ultimate decision.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the support from commenters for § 106.45(b)(7)(i) of the final regulations which, among other things, would require the decision-maker to be different from any person who served as the Title IX Coordinator or investigator, thus foreclosing recipients from utilizing a ''single investigator'' or ''investigator-only'' model for Title IX grievance processes. The Department believes that fundamental fairness to both parties requires that the intake of a report and formal complaint, the investigation (including party and witness interviews and collection of documentary and other evidence), drafting of an investigative report, and ultimate decision about responsibility should not be left in the hands of a single person (or team of persons each of whom performed all those roles). Rather, after the recipient has conducted its impartial investigation, a separate decision-maker must reach the determination regarding responsibility; that determination can be made by one or more decision-makers (such as a panel), but no decision-maker can be the same person who served as the Title IX Coordinator or investigator.

Commenters correctly noted that separating the investigative and decision-making functions will not only increase the overall fairness of the grievance process but also will increase the reliability of fact-finding and the accuracy of outcomes, as well as improve party and public confidence in outcomes. Combining the investigative and adjudicative functions in a single individual may decrease the accuracy of the determination regarding responsibility, because individuals who perform both roles may have confirmation bias and other prejudices that taint the proceedings, whereas separating those functions helps prevent bias and prejudice from impacting the outcome.

Changes: None.

Consistency With Case Law

Comments: Several commenters contended that ending the single investigator model would be consistent with case law. Commenters cited cases where courts overturned recipient findings against respondents, raised concerns regarding preconceptions and biases that may arise where a single person has the power to investigate, prosecute, and convict, and asserted that a single investigator model can impede effective cross-examination and credibility determinations.[1398] On the other hand, some commenters cited case law to suggest the single investigator model can be fair and appropriate.[1399]

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' input on the consistency of the single investigator model with case law. We acknowledge that the Supreme Court has held that a biased decision-maker violates due process but that combining the investigative and adjudicative functions in a single agency does not present a constitutional due process problem.[1400] The final regulations comport with that holding, inasmuch as a single recipient is expected to perform the investigative and adjudicative roles in a Title IX grievance process. As noted by commenters, lower courts have reached mixed results as to whether a single person performing the investigative and adjudicative functions in a student misconduct process violates due process.[1401]

Notwithstanding whether the single investigator model withstands constitutional scrutiny under due process requirements, the Department believes that combining these functions raises an unnecessary risk of bias that may unjustly impact one or both parties in a given Title IX proceeding.[1402] Particularly because the stakes are so high in these cases, with potentially life-altering consequences that may flow from a decision in favor of either party, the Department believes that separating investigation from decision making is important to promote the overall fairness of the process.

The notion that a single individual, acting in these overlapping and conflicting capacities, is capable of effectively implementing an accused student's right of cross-examination by posing prepared questions to witnesses in the course of the investigation ignores the fundamental nature of cross-examination: Adversarial questioning at an in-person hearing at which a neutral fact finder can observe and assess the witness' credibility.'').

Changes: None.

Alternative Approaches To Ending Single Investigator Model

Comments: Some commenters asserted that ending the single investigator model is unnecessary to reduce bias and may in fact increase the risk of unfairness. Commenters argued that Title IX investigators are highly-trained professionals who are often most familiar with the evidence and best-positioned to make credibility determinations and render consistent decisions. These commenters suggested that requiring different decision-makers may increase the risk of overlooked details and incorrect outcomes because other persons may not be as close to the evidence as investigators.

Some commenters argued that hybrid models are adequate and can satisfy due process concerns because, for example, hybrid models in use by some recipients use an investigator (or team of investigators) to gather evidence and write up recommendations about responsibility yet allow both parties to review gathered evidence and pose questions to each other, and hold live hearings for the sanctioning and appeals processes, while parties may resort to civil litigation to challenge the school's proceedings. One commenter acknowledged the possibility of bias within the single investigator model and recommended a hybrid system involving investigation by an impartial investigator followed by referral to a student conduct system for live hearing. One commenter proposed that the Department's concern regarding bias with the single investigator model could be addressed through less restrictive means, such as by allowing parties to assert alleged bias before or during an investigation and by offering an appeal to a different decision-maker to consider alleged bias during the investigation. One commenter suggested that the Department allow recipients who use two investigators to also use them as decision-makers. This commenter argued that two investigators are in the best position to review all the evidence and determine responsibility and appropriate sanction; moreover, ensuring two investigators assigned to each case prevents any one person from being decision-maker and allows the second person to serve as an effective check. Other commenters asserted that prohibiting the single investigator model is unnecessary because the Department already carefully safeguarded the selection process for investigators, Title IX Coordinators, and decision-makers by prohibiting bias and conflicts of interest in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii).

Discussion: The Department believes the robust training and impartiality requirements for all individuals serving as Title IX Coordinators, investigators, or decision-makers contained in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) of the final regulations [1403] will effectively promote the reliability of fact-finding and the overall fairness and accuracy of the grievance process. In addition, the final regulations require that any materials used to train Title IX personnel must not rely on sex stereotypes. We believe these measures will promote consistent outcomes, addressing commenters' concerns about decision-makers not having the same level of training or expertise as investigators. Furthermore, § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) requires the investigator to prepare an investigative report that fairly summarizes all relevant evidence, and therefore the parties and decision-maker will be aware of the evidence gathered during the investigation.

The Department appreciates commenters' suggestion that a ''hybrid'' model could provide many of the same checks against bias and inaccuracy as complete separation of the investigation and adjudication roles. However, the Department believes that formally separating the investigative and adjudicative roles in the Title IX grievance process is important to reduce the risk and perception of bias, increase the reliability of fact-finding, and promote sound bases for responsibility determinations. As such, the Department concludes that adopting the various less restrictive means that commenters suggested to reduce the bias inherent in the single investigator model, such as permitting two investigators to also serve as decision-makers, would not go far enough to promote these important goals. Consistent with the commenters' suggestion, however, the Department also emphasizes that § 106.45(b)(8), in addition to requiring that recipients offer appeals for both parties, explicitly permits either party to assert that the Title IX Coordinator, investigator, or decision-maker had a conflict of interest or bias. These provisions are meant to reinforce each other in increasing the fairness of Title IX proceedings.

Changes: None.

Chilling Reporting and Other Harmful Effects

Comments: Commenters suggested that ending the single investigator model would increase the number of people who must be involved in the Title IX process, and this may increase the risk of untrained and biased people shaming survivors and not believing in them, and also lead to re-traumatization for survivors having to share their stories multiple times. Commenters suggested that ending the single investigator model reinforces the requirement for traumatizing and unnecessary live hearings with cross-examination, which could discourage reporting. Commenters argued that the single investigator model reduces pressure on both parties because the investigator can interact with each party in a less stressful, less adversarial setting.

Commenters asserted that the NPRM's prohibition of the single investigator model could be problematic under Title IX and potentially harmful to parties who want closure, because requiring a separate decision-maker could lengthen the adjudicative process, make it less efficient, and delay resolutions. One commenter argued that ending the single investigator model could frustrate the NPRM's due process goals, by perversely incentivizing recipients to avoid the NPRM's formal grievance process through informal resolution, or incentivize schools to not provide an

Rev. 818, 827 (1983) (noting that the ''commingling of investigatory and adjudicatory functions'' is a ''daily occurrence in [professional] disciplinary proceedings. The Supreme Court in [Withrow v. Larkin, 421 U.S. 35 (1975)], however, concluded that the Constitution tolerates such commingling. Entirely apart from any specific constitutional infirmities, the question remains whether the basic unfairness of the procedure counsels against its use.'') (internal citations omitted); id. at fn. 60 (''There are dangers in allowing an individual who has investigated misconduct and determined that there is probable cause to suspend a professional's license to sit as a trier of fact in a later de novo hearing. A board of education may find it difficult to be unbiased when the chief executive of the school district has already recommended dismissal of a tenured teacher. And the danger of bias undoubtedly increases when an individual actually conducts an investigation (as opposed to passing upon another's work) and then sits as the trier of fact to hear and pass upon the credibility of witnesses.'').

[1403] The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to include training for persons who facilitate informal resolution processes, in addition to Title IX Coordinators, investigators, and decision-makers.

appeal process due to added compliance costs.

Discussion: The Department does not believe that precluding a single investigator model for investigations and adjudications will discourage reporting, traumatize parties, unreasonably lengthen the grievance process, or incentivize recipients to forgo important due process protections for parties. Rather, the purpose of formally separating the investigative and adjudicative functions is to reduce the risk of bias, increase the reliability of fact-finding, and promote sound bases for determinations of responsibility. The Department acknowledges that without a requirement that the decision-maker be separate from any person that performed the role of Title IX Coordinator and investigator, a complainant potentially could give a statement only once—to the single person or team of people performing all those functions, and that complainants may feel intimidated by needing speak with more than one person during the course of the grievance process. Such a necessity, however, is not different from participation in any typical adjudicative process, whether civil or criminal, where a complainant (or civil plaintiff, or victim-witness in a criminal case) would also need to recount the allegations and answer questions several times during the course of an investigation and adjudication. Because a grievance process must contain consistent procedural protections in order to reach factually accurate outcomes, the final regulations ensure that a complainant retains control over deciding whether to participate in a grievance process [1404] and ensures that a complainant can receive supportive measures to restore or preserve the complainant's equal access to education regardless of whether a grievance process is undertaken.[1405] The final regulations also permit recipients to offer and facilitate informal resolution processes which can resolve allegations without a full investigation and adjudication.[1406]

Contrary to the claims made by some commenters that increasing the number of people who must be involved in the formal grievance process would increase the risk of using untrained personnel and causing unfairness, the Department believes that the robust training and impartiality requirements contained in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) that apply to all individuals participating as Title IX Coordinators, investigators, decision-makers, or persons facilitating informal resolution processes, reduce these risks. Furthermore, ensuring that the investigative and adjudicative functions are performed by different individuals is critical for effective live cross-examination, as other commenters noted, because under the single investigator model the decision-maker may be biased in favor of the decision-maker's own investigative recommendations and conclusions rather than listening to party and witness statements during a hearing impartially and with an open mind; similarly, if the decision-maker is the same person as the Title IX Coordinator the decision-maker may be influenced by information gleaned from a complainant due to implementation of supportive measures rather than by information relevant to the allegations at issue. Moreover, under the single investigator model often there is no live hearing where parties can probe each other's credibility and as discussed under § 106.45(b)(6)(i), the Department believes that live hearings are a critical part of a fair process in the postsecondary context.

The Department acknowledges concerns that separating the investigative and adjudicative functions may lengthen the adjudicative process in some cases. However, we emphasize that § 106.45(b)(1)(v) of the final regulations requires that the grievance process be completed within a reasonably prompt time frame, including completion of a live hearing (for postsecondary institutions). We do not believe that eliminating the single investigator model will incentivize recipients to offer informal resolution process to avoid the grievance process. We have revised § 106.45(b)(9) so that informal resolutions must be voluntarily agreed to by each party, forbidding recipients from requiring any party to participate in an informal process, and preventing recipients from conditioning enrollment, employment, or any other right on a party's participation in informal resolution. We have also revised § 106.45(b)(8) to require recipients to offer appeals equally to both parties, which also must be subject to a recipient's designated, reasonably prompt time frames; this revision also ensures that recipients cannot rationalize removal of the single investigator model as a reason to refuse to offer an appeal.

Changes: We have revised § 106.45(b)(9) governing informal resolutions, to forbid recipients from requiring parties to participate in informal resolution and to preclude recipients from conditioning enrollment, employment, or enjoyment of rights on a party's participation in informal resolution. We have revised § 106.45(b)(8) governing appeals to require recipients to offer appeals equally to both parties, on three specified bases: Procedural irregularity, newly discovered evidence, or conflict of interest or bias on the part of Title IX personnel.

Respecting the Roles of Title IX Coordinators and Investigators

Comments: A few commenters asserted that excluding Title IX Coordinators and investigators from any decision-making role is inherently insulting to them because it undervalues their training, professionalism, and expertise. One commenter proposed that the Department require separate investigators and decision-makers, but not prohibit Title IX Coordinators from being decision-makers. This commenter reasoned that Title IX Coordinators are highly trained professionals and Title IX subject matter experts who are reliably impartial and that removing their expertise from the equation may increase the risk of bias, unfairness, and inconsistency across cases.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the integrity and professionalism of individuals serving as Title IX Coordinators. However, and as discussed above, given the high stakes involved for all parties in Title IX [1404] E.g., § 106.30 specifies that only a complainant, or a Title IX Coordinator, can sign or file a formal complainant initiating the grievance process such that even if a report about the complainant's alleged victimization is made to the recipient by a third party, the complainant retains autonomy to decide whether to file a formal complaint; § 106.30 revises the definition of ''complainant'' to remove the phrase ''or on whose behalf the Title IX Coordinator files a formal complaint'' to clarify that even when a Title IX Coordinator does sign a formal complaint initiating a grievance process, that action is not taken ''on behalf of'' the complainant, so that the complainant remains in control of when a formal process is undertaken on the complainant's behalf. The final regulations removed proposed § 106.44(b)(2) that would have required a Title IX Coordinator to file a formal complaint upon receipt of multiple reports against the same respondent, in order to avoid situations where a Title IX Coordinator would have been forced (by the proposed rules) to sign a formal complaint over the wishes of a complainant. The final regulations add § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation and including under prohibited actions those taken to dissuade a complainant from reporting or filing and those taken to punish a complainant (or anyone else) from refusing to participate in a Title IX proceeding.

[1405] E.g., § 106.44(a) requires the Title IX Coordinator promptly to contact each complainant to discuss the availability of supportive measures (with or without a formal complaint being filed), consider the wishes of the complainant with respect to supportive measures, and explain to the complainant the process for filing a formal complaint.

[1406] Section 106.45(b)(9) (permitting informal resolutions of any formal complaint except where the allegations are that an employee has sexually harassed a student).

cases, the Department believes that separating the investigative and adjudicative functions is essential to mitigate the risk of bias and unfairness in the grievance process. The final regulations would not remove the expertise of Title IX Coordinators from the grievance process. Section 106.45(b)(7)(i) does not prevent the Title IX Coordinator from serving as the investigator; rather, this provision only prohibits the decision-maker from being the same person as either the Title IX Coordinator or the investigator. As other commenters have pointed out, the final regulations place significant responsibilities on Title IX Coordinators. Separating the functions of a Title IX Coordinator from those of the decision-maker is no reflection on the ability of Title IX Coordinators to serve impartially and with expertise. Rather, requiring different individuals to serve in those roles acknowledges that the different phases of a report and formal complaint of sexual harassment serve distinct purposes. At each phase, the person responsible for the recipient's response likely will receive information and have communications with one or both parties, for different purposes. For example, the Title IX Coordinator must inform every complainant about the availability of supportive measures and coordinate effective implementation of supportive measures, while the investigator must impartially gather all relevant evidence including party and witness statements, and the decision-maker must assess the relevant evidence, including party and witness credibility, to decide if the recipient has met a burden of proof showing the respondent to be responsible for the alleged sexual harassment. Placing these varied responsibilities in the hands of a single individual (or even team of individuals) risks the person(s) involved improperly relying on information gleaned during one role to affect decisions made while performing a different role. For example, a Title IX Coordinator may have a history of communications with the complainant before any formal complaint has been filed (for instance, due to implementing supportive measures for the complainant), which may influence the Title IX Coordinator's perspective about the complainant's situation before the Title IX Coordinator (if allowed to be the ''decision-maker'') has even spoken with the respondent. Similarly, an investigator may obtain information from a party that is not related to the allegations under investigation during an interview with a party, and if the investigator also serves as the decision-maker, such unrelated information may influence that person's decision making, resulting in a determination that is not based on relevant evidence. Separating the roles of investigation from adjudication therefore protects both parties by making a fact-based determination regarding responsibility based on objective evaluation of relevant evidence more likely.

Changes: None.

Preserving Recipient Autonomy

Comments: Several commenters contended that ending the single investigator model constitutes Federal overreach into recipient decision making. Commenters emphasized that recipients vary widely in size, resources, mission, and composition of students, faculty, and staff, and that imposing a one-size-fits-all approach on them by ending the single investigator model is unwise. Commenters argued that, currently, disciplinary processes are tailored to fit each recipient's unique needs, including the single investigator model where a recipient has deemed that to best fit the recipient's needs. Commenters argued that the Department should not limit school autonomy or dictate how private institutions allocate their staff.

Discussion: The Department respects the importance of granting recipients flexibility and discretion to design and implement policies and procedures that reflect their unique values and the needs of their educational communities. However, this interest must be balanced with other important goals, including increasing the reliability of fact-finding, the overall fairness in the process, and the accuracy of responsibility determinations. Title IX is a Federal civil rights law that requires recipients to operate education programs and activities free from sex discrimination, and when a recipient is presented with allegations of sexual harassment, the Department and the recipient have an interest in ensuring that the recipient applies procedures designed to accurately identify the nature of sexual harassment that has occurred in the recipient's education program or activity. The Department believes that separating the investigative and adjudicative functions most effectively balance the goals of ensuring accurate identification of sexual harassment and respecting recipients' autonomy. The Department notes that the final regulations leave significant flexibility to recipients, including whether the Title IX Coordinator can also serve as the investigator, whether to use a panel of decision-makers or a single decision-maker, and whether to use the recipient's own employees or outsource investigative and adjudicative functions to professionals outside the recipient's employ.

Changes: None.

Consistency With Federal Law and Employment Practices

Comments: Some commenters argued that ending the single investigator model would conflict with Federal and State laws and employment practices. One commenter reasoned that if the respondent is an employee, then the site administrator with line authority may be in best position to investigate due to confidentiality with personnel issues and the Department should not create a conflicting process. Commenters argued that the NPRM's prohibition of the single investigator model is unworkable in the employee context, especially where schools take disciplinary action against at-will employees because at-will employees do not have the same due process rights to their jobs as students do to their education. Commenters asserted that ending the single investigator model could conflict with existing collective bargaining agreements and faculty handbooks. Commenters also asserted that the NPRM's application to the employment context is problematic because workplace harassment is already addressed by Title VII and State non-discrimination laws.

Discussion: The Department acknowledges efficiency interests and the value of a recipient's flexibility and discretion to address sexual misconduct situations involving the recipient's employees, such as by using site administrators to investigate and adjudicate complaints against employee-respondents. However, these interests must be balanced with other important goals, including increasing the reliability of fact-finding, the overall fairness in the process, and the accuracy of responsibility determinations. The Department believes that separating the investigative and adjudicative functions most effectively promotes these goals. As such, the prohibition of the single investigator model contained in § 106.45(b)(7)(i) of the final regulations would apply to all recipients, including elementary and secondary schools and postsecondary institutions, and it would also equally apply to student and employee respondents. For reasons discussed in the ''Section 106.6(f) Title VII and Directed Question 3 (Application to Employees)'' subsection of the ''Clarifying Amendments to Existing Regulations'' section of this preamble, these final regulations apply to any person, including employees, in an education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance.

A recipient may use a site administrator to conduct the investigation into a formal complaint of sexual harassment against an employee, as long as the site administrator is not the decision-maker, as set forth in § 106.45(b)(7)(i). In that situation, the recipient must designate someone other than the site administrator to serve as the decision-maker. If the recipient would like the site administrator to serve as the decision-maker, then the recipient must designate someone other than the site administrator to serve as the investigator.

The Department appreciates the concerns raised by several commenters that ending the single investigator model may pose untenable conflict with State laws, the nature of at-will employment relationships where the respondent is an employee, and with existing collective bargaining agreements and faculty handbooks. With respect to potential conflict with State laws regarding the prohibition of the single investigator model contained in § 106.45(b)(7)(i) of the final regulations, the final regulations preclude the decision-maker from being the same person as the Title IX Coordinator or the investigator, but do not preclude the Title IX Coordinator from serving as the investigator. Further, the final regulations do not prescribe which recipient administrators are in the most appropriate position to serve as a Title IX Coordinator, investigator, or decision-maker, and leave recipients discretion in that regard, including whether a recipient prefers to have certain personnel serve in certain Title IX roles when the respondent is an employee. To generally address commenters' questions about preemption, the Department has added § 106.6(h) which provides that to the extent of a conflict between State or local law and Title IX as implemented by §§ 106.30, 106.44, and 106.45, the obligation to comply with §§ 106.30, 106.44, and 106.45 is not obviated or alleviated by any State or local law.

The Department acknowledges that Title VII and Title IX impose different requirements and that some recipients will need to comply with both Title VII and Title IX, as reflected in § 106.6(f) of these final regulations. The Department believes that recipients may comply with different regulations implementing Title VII and Title IX. These final regulations require all recipients with actual knowledge of sexual harassment in an education program or activity of the recipient against a person in the United States, to respond promptly in a manner that is not deliberately indifferent, irrespective of whether the complainant and respondent are students or employees. The grievance process in § 106.45 does not contradict Title VII or its implementing regulations in any manner and at most may provide more process than Title VII requires (such as specifying that a decision-maker must be a different person than the Title IX Coordinator or investigator). These final regulations, however, do not expand Title VII, as these final regulations are promulgated under Title IX. For further discussion of the intersection between Title VII and these final regulations, see the ''Section 106.6(f) Title VII and Directed Question 3 (Application to Employees)'' subsection of the ''Clarifying Amendments to Existing Regulations'' section of this preamble.

With respect to the general at-will employment doctrine, or the fact that recipients often have employment contracts or collective bargaining agreements in place that govern employee misconduct, where Title IX is implicated the Department has determined that the protections and rights set forth in these final regulations represent the most effective ways to promote Title IX's non-discrimination mandate, and recipients of Federal financial assistance agree to comply with Title IX obligations as a condition of receiving Federal funds. Recipients' contractual arrangements with employees must conform to Federal law, as a condition of receipt of Federal funds.

Limiting the Prohibition of the Single Investigator Model

Comments: Some commenters supported ending the single investigator model but argued against a categorical prohibition. One commenter proposed that the Department only prohibit the single investigator model where the respondent faces the possibility of expulsion or dismissal. This commenter argued that more minor cases, such as sexual harassment claims against respondents for making inappropriate jokes, can be fairly investigated and resolved by a single person without bias. However, the commenter reasoned, where the stakes are higher, such as with a sexual assault allegation and the possibility of dismissal, then a strict separation of the investigative and adjudicative functions is justified. The commenter asserted that this is a logical cost/benefit analysis, especially for smaller recipients. One commenter suggested that the Department should only prohibit the single investigator model for larger schools (such as those with over 3,000 students) or for schools that have greater numbers of Title IX complaints that result in formal investigations (such as ten or more per year). One commenter requested that the Department prohibit the single investigator model but exempt recipients that submit a reasoned written explanation as to why their disciplinary system is fair and necessary. One commenter urged the Department to allow the single investigator model, but only where both parties consent to it. Another commenter emphasized that postsecondary institutions generally have more resources than elementary and secondary school districts, and therefore the Department should initially apply the single investigator prohibition only to postsecondary institutions, and see how effective it is before applying it to elementary and secondary schools.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the logistical concerns raised by some commenters regarding an across-the-board prohibition on the single investigator model contained in the final regulations and the suggestions for alternative approaches. However, the Department believes, as discussed above, that separating requiring investigative and adjudicative roles to be filled by different individuals is critical for reducing the risk of unfairness, increasing the reliability of fact-finding, and enhancing the accuracy of Title IX adjudications. Furthermore, we do not see the propriety in crafting different sets of procedural requirements under Title IX for recipients based on their size, the number of Title IX complaints they typically receive on an annual basis, or the potential severity of the punishment the respondent may receive if determined to be responsible for the alleged sexual harassment. It is unclear what criteria would justify an exemption to the general requirement that the same person cannot investigate and adjudicate a case, particularly because all the conduct described as ''sexual harassment'' under § 106.30 is serious conduct that jeopardizes a victim's equal access to education, and the Department resists attempts to characterize certain forms of sexual harassment defined under § 106.30 as automatically warranting more or less severe sanctions. The Department notes that § 106.45(b)(9) of the final regulations permits informal resolutions as long as both parties voluntarily consent to attempt an informal process.

Informal resolutions under the final regulations would not require more than one person to facilitate the process. In this regard, the Department recognizes the importance of giving recipients flexibility and discretion to satisfy their Title IX obligations in a manner consistent with their unique values and the needs of their educational communities, and the wishes of the parties to each formal complaint.

Requests for Clarification

Comments: Commenters sought clarification on several issues regarding the NPRM's prohibition of the single investigator model. A few commenters asked whether the NPRM requires that the Title IX Coordinator be different than the investigator and, if so, how a Title IX Coordinator can remain fair and unbiased in situations where the NPRM requires the Title IX Coordinator to file a formal complaint. One commenter inquired as to whether the Title IX Coordinator can make preliminary determinations of responsibility that are then passed along to the decision-maker. Another commenter requested more clarity as to whether the NPRM's prohibition on a Title IX Coordinator serving as decision-maker also applies to appeal decisions. One commenter asked whether the decision-maker and hearing officer presiding over the live hearing can be different individuals. Another commenter asserted that § 106.45(b)(7)(i) has been understood to require different individuals to assume each of three different roles: Decision-maker, investigator, and Title IX Coordinator. This commenter inquired as to what the Title IX Coordinator's role would be regarding investigations under the NPRM.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the questions commenters raised regarding the implications of the prohibition of the single investigator model contained in § 106.45(b)(7)(i) of the final regulations. The Department wishes to clarify that the final regulations require the Title IX Coordinator and investigator to be different individuals from the decision-maker, but nothing in the final regulations requires the Title IX Coordinator to be an individual different from the investigator. Nothing in the final regulations prevents Title IX Coordinators from offering recommendations regarding responsibility to the decision-maker for consideration, but the final regulations require the ultimate determination regarding responsibility to be reached by an individual (i.e., the decision-maker) who did not participate in the case as an investigator or Title IX Coordinator.

The final regulations have removed proposed § 106.44(b)(2) that would have required Title IX Coordinators to file formal complaints upon receiving multiple reports of sexual harassment against the same respondent; however, the final regulations leave Title IX Coordinators with discretion to decide to sign a formal complaint on the recipient's behalf. Although signing a formal complaint initiates a grievance process, for reasons discussed in the ''Formal Complaint'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble, we do not believe that taking such an action necessarily renders a Title IX Coordinator biased or poses a conflict of interest, and we have revised the § 106.30 definition of ''formal complaint'' to clarify that Title IX Coordinators must comply with § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) even in situations where the Title IX Coordinator decides to sign a formal complaint.

The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(8) to provide that appeals on specified bases must be offered equally to both parties and that the appeal decision-maker cannot be the same person as the decision-maker who reached the determination regarding responsibility, the Title IX Coordinator, or the investigator. With respect to the roles of a hearing officer and decision-maker, the final regulations leave recipients discretion to decide whether to have a hearing officer (presumably to oversee or conduct a hearing) separate and apart from a decision-maker, and the final regulations do not prevent the same individual serving in both roles. Lastly, regarding the role of the Title IX Coordinator, as discussed above, § 106.8(a) of the final regulations requires recipients to designate and authorize at least one employee to serve as Title IX Coordinator and coordinate the recipient's efforts to comply with the final regulations. Among other things, the Title IX Coordinator is responsible for responding to reports and complaints of sex discrimination (including reports and formal complaints of sexual harassment), informing complainants of the availability of supportive measures and of the process for filing a formal complaint, offering supportive measures to complainants designed to restore or preserve equal access to the recipient's education program or activity, working with respondents to provide supportive measures as appropriate, and coordinating the effective implementation of both supportive measures (to one or both parties) and remedies (to a complainant). As noted previously, the Title IX Coordinator is not precluded from also serving as the investigator, under these final regulations.

Section 106.45(b)(7)(i) Standard of Evidence and Directed Question 6

Mandating a Higher Standard of Evidence

Comments: Several commenters asserted that the Department should mandate a higher standard of evidence than the preponderance of the evidence standard. Commenters cited cases describing the preponderance of the evidence standard as inadequate in sexual misconduct cases given the seriousness of allegations, the lack of other procedural safeguards found in civil litigation, and the reputational and socioeconomic damage resulting from a finding of sexual misconduct responsibility. Some commenters argued that the Department should mandate, or at least permit, recipients to use the criminal ''beyond a reasonable doubt'' standard in Title IX adjudications.[1407] One commenter suggested that the Department mandate the clear and convincing evidence standard but only where the alleged sexual misconduct is a Clery Act/VAWA offense or where the potential sanction is expulsion or suspension. One commenter asserted that Supreme Court case law requires application of the beyond a reasonable doubt standard in school Title IX proceedings.[1408]

Commenters asserted that the clear and convincing evidence standard would enhance the overall accuracy of the system by reducing false positives as compared to the preponderance of the evidence standard. One commenter argued that requiring the clear and convincing evidence standard is essential to protect academic freedom and free speech because it would be unjust to have a mere 50 percent threshold to punish professors for ''improper'' or controversial speech in their classrooms. One commenter asserted that it is especially important to raise the standard of evidence because Commenters also cited: Jackson v. *Metro. in the current #MeToo environment women are automatically believed and men are assumed guilty; this commenter argued that sexual misconduct cases often boil down to credibility and such allegations are virtually impossible to disprove.

Discussion: The Department acknowledges the suggestions offered by commenters to mandate a higher standard of evidence than the preponderance of the evidence standard, such as the clear and convincing evidence standard, or the beyond a reasonable doubt standard used in criminal proceedings. In recognition that sexual misconduct cases involve high stakes and potentially life-altering consequences for both parties, and such cases often involve competing, plausible narratives about the truth of allegations, the Department authorizes recipients, in § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) of the final regulations, to select either the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard to reach determinations regarding responsibility.[1409] Because Title IX proceedings differ in purpose and consequence from criminal proceedings, the Department does not believe the criminal law standard of ''beyond a reasonable doubt'' is appropriate in a noncriminal setting like a Title IX grievance process for various reasons.[1410] Recipients are not courts and do not have the power to impose a criminal punishment such as imprisoning a respondent. Recipients bear the burden of proof under § 106.45(b)(5)(i), but they do not have subpoena power. These final regulations also provide privacy protections for complainants and respondents which prohibits the recipient from accessing, considering, disclosing, or otherwise using a party's treatment records without the party's voluntary, written consent under § 106.45(b)(5)(i), even if these treatment records are relevant to the allegations in a formal complaint. The ''beyond a reasonable doubt'' standard also is rarely used in any civil proceeding.[1411] We therefore decline to permit a recipient to select that standard of evidence, and instead permit a recipient to select either of two standards of evidence, each of which is used in civil matters.[1412] The Department shares commenters' concerns for protecting academic freedom and free speech, and § 106.6(d)(1) emphasizes that nothing in the final regulations requires restriction of rights otherwise protected by the First Amendment. To further reinforce First Amendment rights, § 106.44(a) of the final regulations would explicitly prohibit the Department from deeming recipients' restriction of rights protected under the First Amendment to be evidence that the recipient was not deliberately indifferent, and the conduct constituting actionable harassment under § 106.30 must be either serious misconduct constituting quid pro quo harassment or Clery Act/VAWA sex offenses, or meet the Davis standard of being severe, pervasive, and objectively offensive denying a person equal educational access.[1413] When a formal complaint alleges conduct constituting ''sexual harassment'' as defined in § 106.30, the Department has concluded that the robust procedural protections granted to both parties in § 106.45 mean that the preponderance of the evidence standard, or the clear and convincing evidence standard, may be used to reach consistently fair, reliable outcomes. Contrary to the claims made by one commenter, the Supreme Court has never required application of the criminal ''beyond a reasonable doubt'' standard in Title IX proceedings, and the Department is not aware of a Federal appellate court decision requiring adoption of the criminal standard of evidence in Title IX proceedings. The Department believes that requiring such a ''beyond a reasonable doubt'' standard of evidence in a noncriminal Title IX proceeding is unnecessary to meet due process of law and fundamental fairness requirements, or increase accuracy of outcomes, in Title IX grievance processes.

Changes: The final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(7)(i) to refer to the revised requirement in § 106.45(b)(1)(vii), such that the a recipient must select between the preponderance of the evidence standard and clear and convincing evidence standard, and apply that selected standard consistently to all formal complaints alleging Title IX sexual harassment regardless of whether the respondent is a student or an employee. We also revise § 106.44(a) of the final regulations to explicitly prohibit the Department from deeming recipients' restriction of rights protected under the First Amendment to be evidence that the recipient was not deliberately indifferent.

Supporting § 106.45(b)(7)(i)

Comments: Some commenters expressed support for the NPRM's approach to the standard of evidence. Commenters asserted that many collective bargaining agreements (CBAs) applicable to school employees mandate the clear and convincing evidence standard and argued that students deserve the same rights and protections since students are the ones paying tuition. One commenter cited a poll about public perceptions of higher education that found 71 percent of people responding to the poll believed, ''[s]tudents accused of sexual assault on college campuses should be punished only if there is clear and convincing evidence that they are guilty of a crime.'' [1414]

Discussion: The Department appreciates the support from commenters regarding the proposed rules' approach to the standard of evidence. For reasons discussed above, the final regulations at § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) and § 106.45(b)(7)(i) continue to permit recipients to select between the preponderance of the evidence standard, or the clear and convincing evidence standard. We acknowledge the poll cited by one commenter finding that the majority of people responding to the poll supported application of the clear and convincing evidence standard to address allegations of sexual assault in the postsecondary context. While the Department does not reach legal or policy decisions on the basis of public polls, we believe that in light of the strong procedural rights granted to both parties under the § 106.45 grievance process, either the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard may be applied to reach fair, accurate determinations regarding responsibility in Title IX grievance processes, and recipients should be permitted to select either standard.

We acknowledge that many employee CBAs mandate the clear and convincing evidence standard. The Department believes that giving recipients the choice between the preponderance of the evidence standard and the clear and convincing evidence standard, along with the requirement contained in § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) that the same standard of evidence must apply for complaints against students as for complaints against employees and faculty, helps to ensure consistency in recipients' handling of Title IX proceedings. To better ensure that recipients have a true choice between the two standards of evidence, we have removed the NPRM's language from § 106.45(b)(7)(i) that would have allowed selection of the preponderance of the evidence standard only if the recipient also used that standard for non-sexual harassment misconduct that carried similar potential sanctions. The grievance process, including the standard of evidence the recipient will apply, should not vary based on the identity or status of the respondent (i.e., student or employee). However, each recipient is allowed to select one of the two standards of evidence (both of which are used in a variety of civil proceedings) to decide what degree of confidence the recipient's decision-makers must have in the factual correctness of determinations regarding responsibility in Title IX grievance processes.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(7)(i) of the final regulations such that recipients have the choice of either applying the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard, and § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) requires a recipient to make that choice applicable to all formal complaints of sexual harassment, including those against employees and faculty. We have removed the limitation contained in the NPRM that would have permitted recipients to use the preponderance of the evidence standard only if a recipient used that standard for non-sexual misconduct that has the same maximum disciplinary sanction.

One-Sided Condition on Choice of Evidentiary Standard

Comments: Commenters questioned the NPRM's requirement that if the preponderance of the evidence standard is used in Title IX cases then it must be used in non-Title IX cases with the same maximum punishment. Commenters suggested this would undermine recipient flexibility. Some commenters asserted that the NPRM presented a false choice of an evidentiary standard because the proposed rules imposed a one-way ratchet where schools may use the clear and convincing evidence standard in sexual assault cases and a lower standard in other cases, but not vice versa, thereby disadvantaging complainants in sexual harassment situations but not in other situations. Some commenters asserted that the Department lacks authority under Title IX to impose requirements on non-Title IX related disciplinary proceedings.

One commenter argued that the Department should not interfere with recipient autonomy in determining the appropriate standard of evidence; this commenter suggested that the Department: (1) Limit the preponderance of the evidence standard to recipients who used it before the Department advised them to; (2) limit the preponderance of the evidence standard for sexual misconduct cases to recipients who had the preponderance of the evidence standard for non-sexual cases before the NPRM; or (3) mandate all recipients use the clear and convincing evidence standard, but allow recipients to adopt the preponderance of the evidence standard if done by internal process initiated at least one year after the clear and convincing evidence standard takes effect.

One commenter asserted the NPRM's approach to standard of evidence is a heavy-handed Federal mandate to use the clear and convincing evidence standard, which is inconsistent with the current Administration's deregulatory agenda. This commenter asserted that the Department should not usurp the authority of school boards or micromanage recipients.

Discussion: The Department is persuaded by the concerns raised by commenters that the NPRM's prohibition on recipients using the preponderance of the evidence standard unless they also used that standard for non-sexual misconduct that carries the same maximum punishment constituted a one-way restriction that appeared to many commenters to leave a recipient without a genuine choice between the two standards of evidence. The Department is also persuaded by commenters' objections that the NPRM approach may have had the unintended consequence of pressuring recipients to choose a standard of evidence for non-Title IX misconduct situations, potentially exceeding the Department's authority to effectuate the purpose of Title IX. For these reasons, the Department has simplified its approach to the standard of evidence contained in § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) and referenced in § 106.45(b)(7)(i), such that recipients may select the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard, without restricting that selection based on what standard of evidence a recipient uses in non-Title IX proceedings. The Department believes this revised approach better ensures that the Department is not inspecting how recipients handle non-Title IX misconduct proceedings.

We acknowledge the alternative approaches to the standard of evidence raised by one commenter that would limit the application of the preponderance of the evidence standard. However, the Department believes that recipients are in the best position to select the standard of evidence that suits their unique values and the needs of their educational community and the Department thus declines to impose restrictions or requirements upon recipients who select the preponderance of the evidence standard. Because the final regulations grant recipients the unrestricted right to choose between the preponderance of the evidence standard and the clear and convincing evidence standard, we disagree that the final regulations reflect a heavy-handed Federal mandate inconsistent with the current Administration's deregulatory agenda.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(7)(i) of the final regulations such that recipients have the choice of either applying the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard, and § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) requires a recipient to make that choice applicable to all formal complaints of sexual harassment, including those against employees and faculty. We have removed the limitation contained in the NPRM that would have permitted recipients to use the preponderance of the evidence standard only if they used that standard for non-sexual misconduct that has the same maximum disciplinary sanction.

Same Evidentiary Standard in Student and Faculty Cases

Comments: Several commenters expressed support for the NPRM's requirement that the same standard of evidence be used in student and faculty cases. Commenters stated that this is important for fairness; the Department should not permit recipients to disfavor certain groups. A few commenters raised the point that, unlike students, employees and faculty often have superior leverage as a group when negotiating terms with recipients. Commenters stated that the NPRM's approach would level this playing field. One commenter contended that setting the same standard for both students and employees will enhance predictability and consistency. Another commenter asserted that promoting a uniform set of evidentiary standards would reduce recipients' costs to administer their Title IX disciplinary programs and train personnel.

Some commenters believed that the Department was correctly encouraging schools to apply the clear and convincing evidence standard in Title IX cases. They stated that the clear and convincing evidence standard is appropriate given the long-lasting and serious consequences of being deemed responsible for sexual misconduct. Commenters argued that faculty may lose lifelong employment and suffer permanent reputational damage, and the preponderance of the evidence standard is insufficient to protect academic freedom and tenure. One commenter argued that just because the preponderance of the evidence standard is used in civil litigation does not mean it is appropriate for Title IX proceedings; the two systems are fundamentally distinct because the latter does not have procedural protections such as civil access to counsel, discovery, cross-examination, presumption of innocence, juries, or impartiality of decision-makers that may otherwise render the proceeding fair despite a lower evidentiary standard. The commenter asserted that the clear and convincing evidence standard may also mitigate the impact of racial bias that disproportionately affects male students and faculty in sexual harassment cases.

Other commenters opposed the NPRM's requirement that the same standard of evidence apply in student and faculty cases. Commenters emphasized the practical difficulty of recipients changing applicable standards for employee cases, given the reality that many faculty collective bargaining agreements (CBAs) mandate the clear and convincing evidence standard [1415] and that many postsecondary institutions choose to follow American Association of University Professors (AAUP) standards that include a clear and convincing evidence standard for faculty misconduct, even if the recipient's CBA does not mandate that standard.[1416] Commenters asserted that some State laws require recipients to use the clear and convincing evidence standard, especially for tenured faculty discipline cases, which may negate the flexibility that the Department was trying to provide recipients regarding a choice of standard of evidence. Commenters argued that recipients subject to such CBAs or State laws do not have a neutral choice because these recipients may be required to use a clear and convincing evidence standard for employees and the NPRM requires such recipients to also use that standard for students even if recipients would rather use different standards for students than employees. Other commenters stated that some State laws require postsecondary institution recipients to apply a preponderance of the evidence standard to student sexual misconduct disciplinary proceedings yet the proposed regulations may leave such recipients with a potential conflict between continuing to follow their State law by using the preponderance of the evidence standard (in student cases) but violating these final regulations (if the recipient is also bound under a CBA to apply a clear and convincing evidence standard to faculty misconduct and cannot raise the standard of evidence used in student cases without violating State law).

One commenter stated that at the commenter's university, clear and convincing evidence is required to dismiss a faculty member while a preponderance of the evidence is required to punish a student, even for similar misconduct, which ''translates to the school being less inclined to fire a faculty member over an allegation than to punish a student over an allegation.'' This commenter argued that the proposed rules would force schools in that situation to make a choice: Either lower the standard of evidence required to dismiss a faculty member, or raise the standard of evidence for all claims to the standard used for dismissing a faculty member, which would mean either making it easier to prove accusations against a faculty member or making it harder to prove any allegation (against any respondent). The commenter believed that the proposed rules should not force schools to make a choice between making it easier to fire faculty or making it harder to believe sexual assault victims.

One commenter cited studies of faculty sexual harassment cases that showed professors usually have multiple victims, mostly students, and that faculty harassers who experience sanctions are less likely to repeat serious harassment.[1417] This commenter argued that if the proposed rules' approach leads universities to comply by applying the clear and convincing evidence standard across the board for student and faculty sexual misconduct matters, then in effect universities would be forced by Federal regulatory requirements to ''single out'' for unfavorable treatment their faculty and graduate students who are investigated for research misconduct because Federal regulations require research misconduct linked to federally funded research grants to be shown under a preponderance of the evidence standard, while sexual misconduct would be investigated under a clear and convincing evidence standard. The commenter asserted that because a finding of research misconduct carries significant public stigma (such as the respondent's name and case summary posted on government websites and scientific watchdog organization websites), concern for the heightened stigma faced by respondents accused of sexual misconduct is not an appropriate justification for the proposed rules' apparent encouragement of the clear and convincing evidence standard.

Some commenters argued that discipline of students, and discipline of employees, serve fundamentally different goals and applying a one-size-fits-all approach is inappropriate. Commenters asserted that student discipline has a mainly educational purpose, whereas employee discipline is about when to take adverse employment action. Commenters cited scholarly articles and cases to suggest that students and employees are different constituencies with different interests; for example, universities have obligations to protect student safety that differ from obligations to protect employee safety.[1418] Commenters asserted that the student/recipient relationship is different than the employee/recipient relationship, in part because the student pays tuition to gain educational and developmental services from the school and the school has an affirmative obligation to create an educational environment conducive to that goal. On the other hand, commenters argued, employees provide services to the school, mainly to benefit the students, and are paid by the school for their services, and while all employees have a right to a workplace free from discrimination, the school has no obligation to encourage an employee's social and personal development. Commenters argued that Title IX is about equal educational access, not about making sure that schools treat all classes of respondents the same way. One commenter contended that it is unfair to hold students to the same standard of evidence as employees because students are not parties to the employee union's CBAs and argued that the Department should not bind students to outcomes of negotiations in which the students could not participate. One commenter stated that, unlike students, university employees can lose lifetime employment, a much more serious outcome than being forced to leave one particular university, and this difference justifies using a higher burden of proof in faculty cases.

One commenter asserted that the proposed rules' requirement to use the same standard of evidence for cases with student-respondents as with employee-respondents stems from anti-union bias.

One commenter argued that the proposed choice given to recipients in the NPRM could potentially expose recipients to liability for sex discrimination under 34 CFR 106.51 (''A recipient shall not enter into a contractual or other relationship which directly or indirectly has the effect of subjecting employees or students to discrimination . . .'') (emphasis added). This commenter argued that recipients who currently use the preponderance of the evidence standard in sexual harassment cases involving student-respondents, may be forced by the NPRM to raise the standard of evidence to the clear and convincing evidence standard in order to comply with recipients' CBAs, yet that reason for raising the standard of evidence (and, in the commenter's view, disfavoring complainants by raising the standard of evidence) may constitute violation of 34 CFR 106.51 because raising the standard of evidence to match what the recipient uses in a CBA could be viewed as having entered into a CBA (i.e., a contractual or other relationship) that indirectly has the effect of subjecting students to discrimination (i.e., by ''disfavoring'' complainants alleging sexual harassment).

One commenter contended that the inherent power imbalance between faculty and students means that faculty may be viewed as more credible than students, and thus the applicable standard of evidence should not necessarily be identical.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support for the approach to recipients' selection of a standard of evidence, and agrees that offering a choice between two reasonable standards provides consistency across cases, within each recipient's educational community, regardless of whether the respondent is an employee or a student, while providing recipients flexibility to select the standard that best meets the recipient's unique needs and reflects the recipient's values. The Department disputes commenters' assertion that the Department is encouraging the selection of the clear and convincing evidence standard. As shown by the fact the final regulations respond to commenters' concerns by removing the NPRM's restriction on the use of the preponderance of the evidence standard, the Department's intention is to permit recipients to choose between two standards of evidence, either of which can be applied to Title IX grievance processes to produce fair and reliable outcomes.

The Department acknowledges the concerns raised by some commenters regarding the challenges that may arise from implementing the requirement contained in § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) and § 106.45(b)(7)(i) that the same standard of evidence be used for complaints against students as for complaints against employees and faculty. We recognize the reality that some employee CBAs or State laws mandate application of the clear and convincing evidence standard for employee or faculty misconduct, that some recipients use a lower standard of evidence in cases involving student-respondents than in cases involving employee-respondents, and that it may be challenging for such recipients to decide whether to raise the standard of evidence (for student cases) or lower the standard of evidence (for employee cases) so that all formal complaints of sexual harassment use the same standard of evidence as required under the final regulations. The Department believes that recipients should carry the same burden of proof,[1419] weighing relevant evidence against the same standard of evidence, with respect to any complainant's allegations of Title IX sexual harassment. The Department believes that complainants in a recipient's educational community should face the same process, including the same standard of evidence, in a Title IX grievance process regardless of whether the respondent who allegedly sexually harassed the complainant is a student, employee, or faculty member. The Department believes that either the preponderance of the evidence standard, or the clear and convincing evidence standard, may be applied to allegations of sexual harassment to reach fair, reliable outcomes, and thus the Department permits recipients to select either of those standards of evidence. As shown by the fact that commenters confirmed that many recipients currently use the clear and convincing evidence standard of evidence in employee-respondent sexual misconduct cases while using the preponderance of the evidence standard of evidence standard in student-respondent cases, valid reasons exist as to why a recipient might believe that either one of those standards of evidence reflects the appropriate level of confidence that decision-makers should have in the factual correctness of determinations regarding responsibility in sexual misconduct cases. The final regulations require recipients to give complainants the predictability of knowing that the standard of evidence that applies to a formal complaint of sexual harassment in a particular recipient's grievance process will not vary depending on whether the complainant was sexually harassed by a fellow student, or by a school employee.

The Department acknowledges that employees and faculty members may have greater bargaining power and leverage than students in extracting guarantees of protection under a recipient's grievance procedures, and that some recipients apply a clear and convincing evidence standard for complaints of employee misconduct through CBAs or due to choosing to follow AAUP guidelines. However, the Department does not believe that is necessary or reasonable to draw distinctions among complainants alleging Title IX sexual harassment based on the status of the respondent as a ''student'' versus an ''employee.'' Furthermore, a growing trend within postsecondary institutions is for graduate students to unionize, and such a trend blurs the lines between categories of students and employees, with respect to collective bargaining power.[1420]

Collective bargaining through a union may, as commenters asserted, give employees greater ''bargaining power'' than students have; on the other hand, student activism often succeeds in ''bargaining'' for university action on a variety of matters that affect students. Regardless of the relative strength of ''bargaining power'' of employees and students, the Department believes that a recipient must implement a fair grievance process for all complainants that does not use a different standard of evidence based on whether the complainant alleges sexual harassment against an employee, or against a student. Complainants (especially students) who allege sexual harassment against an employee already face the possibility that the respondent, as an employee, may be in a position of actual or perceived authority over the complainant, and the Department does not wish to encourage recipients to exacerbate that power differential by treating some complainants (i.e., those who allege sexual harassment against a recipient's employee) differently from other complainants (i.e., those who allege sexual harassment against a recipient's student) by requiring the former group of complainants to navigate a grievance process that will apply a higher standard of evidence than complainants in the latter group of complainants.[1421] Complainants should know that their school, college, or university has selected a standard of evidence (representing the ''degree of confidence''[1422] that a recipient requires a decision-maker to have in the factual accuracy of the determination regarding responsibility) that will apply regardless of the identity, status, or position of authority of the respondent.

The Department does not view the potential consequences of being found responsible for sexual harassment as less serious for students than employees; while employees face potential loss of employment, students face potential loss of educational opportunities which may also affect a student's career opportunities. While some employees found responsible for sexual harassment may lose all future career opportunities and some students found responsible may transfer to other institutions, the converse also occurs; some employees found responsible find work elsewhere and some students found responsible find it impossible to transfer to other institutions. The potential consequences of being found responsible, therefore, may be just as serious for a student as for an employee, and differences in the nature of potential consequences does not justify using a different standard of evidence for employee-respondent cases than for student-respondent cases. At the same time, a complainant alleging Title IX sexual harassment faces potential loss of equal educational access if sexual harassment allegations are not resolved accurately, regardless of whether the complainant has been allegedly sexually harassed by a student or by an employee. For respondents (whether students or employees) and for complainants (whether students or employees), it is important for a Title IX grievance process to reach a reliable outcome.[1423]

The Department agrees that recipients have a different relationship with the recipient's students than with the recipient's employees; the Department's approach to the standard of evidence ensures that a recipient does not adjudicate a student-complainant's formal complaint differently based on whether the student-complainant was allegedly sexually harassed by a student, or by an employee. Because the final regulations do not require particular disciplinary sanctions, the final regulations do not preclude a recipient from imposing student discipline as part of an ''educational purpose'' that may differ from the purpose for which a recipient imposes employee discipline. The Department's approach to the standard of evidence is not based on concern that a recipient must treat all classes of respondents the same way, but is based on the Department's concern that all complainants within a recipient's education program or activity are treated the same way, including facing the same standard of evidence when a complainant's sexual harassment allegations are resolved.

Permitting recipients to select between the two standards of evidence allows recipients who face conflicting

Rev. 739, 741–42 (2019) (noting that as college enrollment has increased, so has the number of teaching staff, and that as of 2013 the Bureau of Labor Statistics found there were approximately 1.13 million graduate teaching assistants employed at postsecondary institutions); id. at 780 (after detailing the history of unionization of graduate students at public and private colleges and universities, concluding that the National Labor Relations Board has most recently laid groundwork for a continuing trend toward graduate student unionization).

[1421] The standard of evidence used for a class of claims reflects a societal judgment about the level of confidence a decision-maker should have before reaching a conclusion in the case. E.g., In re Winship, 397 U.S. 358, 370 (1970) (Harlan, J., concurring) (the purpose of a standard of proof is ''to instruct the factfinder concerning the degree of confidence our society thinks he should have in the correctness of factual conclusions for a particular type of adjudication.''). The Department believes that a recipient's selection of a standard of evidence appropriate for resolving sexual harassment formal complaints should reflect the recipient's decision about the level of confidence the recipient believes a decision-maker should have in reaching a conclusion, that all complainants who file formal complaints of sexual harassment with a recipient should have the benefit of understanding the recipient's decision on that issue, and that different ''degrees of confidence'' should not be applied based on a respondent's status as a student or employee because whether the respondent is a student or employee does not necessarily alter the nature of the harm that the alleged conduct inflicted on the complainant or lessen the seriousness of potential consequences for the respondent.

[1422] Id.

[1423] For an example of divergent views about the appropriate standard of evidence within a university's faculty members, raising arguments for and against retaining the clear and convincing evidence standard for employees, see, e.g., Matt Butler, Standard of proof in sexual assault cases debated by professors, The Review (Nov. 10, 2014) (University of Delaware student newspaper article reporting on a faculty debate about whether the university should lower the standard of evidence used in faculty sexual misconduct cases from the clear and convincing evidence standard to the preponderance of the evidence standard, in light of OCR's insistence that universities must use the preponderance of the evidence standard, reporting that ''some faculty supported the lower burden of proof as a means of creating—in reality and perception—a safer place for students'' but also quoting Kathy Turkel, a women and gender studies professor, as asserting that ''the student environment should be the most important factor'' but ''the lower standards of proof violate due process rights of the professors'' and a ''higher standard of proof'' would ''outweigh the negatives, and it would actually help both the accuser and the accused in cases of sexual assault'' because ''it is due process that protects both complainants and perpetrators in these cases'').

requirements imposed by contracts or laws outside these final regulations the ability to resolve such conflict in whichever way a recipient deems appropriate.[1424] Not all recipients are subject to CBAs that require a different standard of evidence for employee discipline than the recipient uses for student discipline, and not all recipients are subject to State laws that mandate the standard of evidence to be used in student disciplinary cases; such recipients may select a standard of evidence in compliance with these final regulations without the external factors of CBA or State law requirements. For recipients who have CBAs requiring a clear and convincing evidence standard in employee cases but no State law directive requiring a different standard of evidence in student cases, recipients may comply with these final regulations by using the clear and convincing evidence standard in student cases, or by renegotiating their CBAs to use the preponderance of the evidence standard for employee cases.

For recipients who do have CBAs requiring a clear and convincing evidence standard (in employee cases) and State laws requiring a preponderance of the evidence standard (in student cases), such recipients may find it appropriate to comply with these final regulations by renegotiating their CBAs rather than violate State law. We acknowledge commenters' point that renegotiating a CBA is often a time-consuming process; however, a recipient's contractual and employment arrangements must comply with Federal laws,[1425] and recipients of Federal financial assistance understand that a condition placed upon receipt of Federal funds is operation of education programs or activities free from sex discrimination under Title IX, including compliance with regulations implementing Title IX. Some recipients cooperatively worked with their employee unions and renegotiated their CBAs in response to the Department's withdrawn 2011 Dear Colleague Letter so that the recipient would use the preponderance of the evidence standard with respect to employee cases, and student cases.[1426] These final regulations do not require recipients who have already modified their policies and procedures in that manner to make further changes in that regard, because under these final regulations a recipient may select the preponderance of the evidence standard.

These final regulations are focused on the appropriate standard of evidence for use in resolving allegations of Title IX sexual harassment, and not on the appropriate standard of evidence for use in cases of other types of misconduct by students, or employees. This is emphasized by our revision to the final regulations removing the NPRM's approach that tied the preponderance of the evidence standard to the standard of evidence a recipient uses in non-sexual harassment misconduct cases. Whether or not a recipient is required to use a certain standard of evidence under Federal regulations governing non-sexual misconduct violations (for instance, research misconduct by faculty or graduate students), the Department's concern in these final regulations is ensuring that a recipient uses a single, selected standard of evidence for Title IX sexual harassment cases so that complainants alleging sexual harassment face a predictable grievance process regardless of whether the complainant has alleged sexual harassment by a student, employee, or faculty member.

Contrary to commenters' assertions otherwise, the Department does not through these final regulations promote or encourage the clear and convincing evidence standard (or the preponderance of the evidence standard) and while we acknowledge that reputational stigma and potential life-altering consequences facing respondents accused of sexual misconduct may be reasons why a recipient might select a clear and convincing evidence standard, we do not contend that reputational stigma or life-altering consequences are absent in other types of misconduct allegations, such as research misconduct by graduate students or faculty.[1427]

The Department does not believe this approach to a recipient selecting the standard of evidence for use in all Title IX sexual harassment cases harms unions or reflects anti-union bias. If a recipient decides to renegotiate CBA terms in order to comply with Title IX obligations, that result is for the benefit of all students and employees (including complainants and respondents) whose Title IX rights will be more predictable and transparent, reflecting the recipient's judgment as to what level of confidence decision-makers should have in the accuracy of determinations regarding responsibility in sexual harassment cases. The Department does not believe that this [1424] The challenge with potential conflict between Federal Title IX expectations regarding a standard of evidence, and CBAs that require a different (usually higher) standard of evidence, is a challenge that has faced recipients since the Department first took a position with respect to an appropriate standard of evidence. In the withdrawn 2011 Dear Colleague Letter the Department insisted that only the preponderance of the evidence standard was appropriate in Title IX sexual harassment cases and made no exception for cases against faculty. The Department believes that the approach in these final regulations may help recipients address the challenge that some recipients face in reconciling CBAs with Title IX obligations, by allowing recipients to select one of two reasonable options regarding a standard of evidence for Title IX purposes. See Lance Toron Houston, Title IX Sexual Assault Investigations in Public Institutions of Higher Education: Constitutional Due Process Implications of the Evidentiary Standard Set Forth in the Department of Education's 2011 Dear Colleague Letter, 34 Hofstra Labor & Employment L. [1427] We disagree that using a clear and convincing evidence standard for formal complaints of sexual harassment, while using a preponderance of the evidence standard for allegations of research misconduct, necessarily places respondents accused of the latter misconduct in a disfavored position. The elements of research misconduct differ from the elements of sexual harassment (as defined in § 106.30) in ways that may justify using different standards of evidence (as explained above, a standard of evidence represents the degree of confidence the decision-maker must have in having reached a factually correct conclusion). For instance, ''research misconduct'' requires the misconduct to be committed intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly, while the § 106.30 definition of sexual harassment does not require an element of intentionality. E.g., Gary S. Marx, An Overview of The Research Misconduct Process and an Analysis of the Appropriate Burden of Proof, 42 Journal of Coll. & Univ. L. 311, 317 (2016) (''Under the regulations adopted by HHS and by NSF, the following evidence is required to establish research misconduct: (a) There must be a significant departure from accepted practices of the relevant research community, (b) the misconduct must be committed intentionally, knowingly, or recklessly; and (c) the allegation must be proven by a preponderance of the evidence.'').

approach subjects recipients to liability under 34 CFR 106.51, because the Department does not assume that a recipient that changes the standard of evidence used in student cases to be the same standard as the recipient uses under employee CBAs makes that change for the purpose of disadvantaging complainants who allege sexual harassment; the Department believes that a recipient that makes that decision does so because the recipient has determined that the selected standard of evidence is the appropriate standard for resolving sexual harassment allegations. As discussed throughout this ''Section 106.45(b)(7)(i) Standard of Evidence and Directed Question 6'' subsection, commenters noted a variety of reasons to prefer the preponderance of the evidence standard over the clear and convincing evidence standard and vice versa. The Department believes that either standard of evidence (preponderance of the evidence, or clear and convincing evidence) may be applied fairly to reach reliable outcomes. The Department also does not believe that a recipient that selects the clear and convincing evidence standard subjects complainants to discrimination by ''disfavoring'' complainants of sexual harassment compared to complainants of other forms of misconduct just because the preponderance of the evidence is used as the standard in other forms of misconduct. As noted previously with respect to, for example, Federal regulations that require use of the preponderance of the evidence standard in cases of research misconduct, there may be differences in the elements needed to prove a type of misconduct that may justify using different standards of evidence. Further, the severity of potential consequences of a finding of responsibility for sexual misconduct may differ from the potential consequences of a finding of other kinds of misconduct. Additionally, recipients sometimes use a standard of evidence lower than the preponderance of the evidence standard for student misconduct. Thus, unless using preponderance also ''disfavors'' complainants of sexual harassment because some misconduct may continue to be decided under a lower standard of evidence, the Department does not believe that a recipient's use of the clear and convincing evidence standard subjects complainants of sexual harassment to discrimination (by ''disfavoring'' them) just because other types of misconduct may be decided under the preponderance of the evidence standard.[1428]

Whether or not commenters are correct in noting that power differentials between employees (particularly faculty) and students may tempt recipients to treat faculty as more credible than students, the final regulations allow recipients to select one of two standards of evidence consistently to all formal complaints; under either standard selected, the recipient is obligated to assess credibility based on objective evaluation of the evidence and not due to the party's status as a complainant or respondent,[1429] and without bias for or against complainants or respondents generally or for or against an individual complainant or respondent.[1430]

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(7)(i) of the final regulations such that recipients have the choice of either applying the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard, and § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) requires a recipient to make that choice applicable to all formal complaints of sexual harassment, including those against employees and faculty. We have removed the limitation contained in the NPRM that would have permitted recipients to use the preponderance of the evidence standard only if they used that standard for non-sexual misconduct that has the same maximum disciplinary sanction.

Requiring the Preponderance of the Evidence Standard

Comments: Many commenters urged the Department to mandate the preponderance of the evidence standard in Title IX proceedings. Commenters argued that the preponderance of the evidence standard is the only standard that treats both parties fairly, consistent with Title IX's requirement that grievance procedures be ''equitable,'' and that a higher standard would unfairly tilt proceedings in favor of respondents and against complainants.[1431] Commenters argued that application of a heightened standard specifically in sexual misconduct cases reflects wrongful stereotypes that survivors, mainly girls and women, are more likely to lie than students who report other types of misconduct.[1432] Commenters argued that the preponderance of the evidence standard is most appropriate because both parties have an equal interest in continuing their education. Commenters cited Title IX experts who support the preponderance of the evidence standard because, for example, it treats both parties equitably, levels the playing field between men and women, and because any higher standard than preponderance of the evidence would unfairly benefit respondents and discourage reporting of sexual assault by sending the message that a respondent's future at the institution is more important than the complainant's future

at the institution.[1433] At least one commenter opined that using anything other than the preponderance standard demonstrates caring more about the accused than the complainant.[1434]

Commenters also asserted that the Department's longstanding practice has been to require the preponderance of the evidence standard, that many recipients currently use this standard,[1435] and that courts generally use the preponderance of the evidence standard in civil rights litigation including for Title VI and Title VII.[1436] At least one commenter argued that VAWA created civil rights of action for claims of rape and sexual assault and requires the preponderance of the evidence standard, and thus Title IX should not permit a different evidentiary standard to be used for conduct that also constitutes rape and sexual assault.[1437] One commenter invoked the canon of in pari materia, in which similar statutes should be interpreted similarly, and argued that because lawsuits under Title VI and Title VII cases apply the preponderance of the evidence standard and these statutes serve the same basic civil rights purpose as Title IX, the preponderance of the evidence standard should also apply in Title IX proceedings.

Commenters argued that Title IX proceedings do not involve potential denial of significant liberty interests or jail, but rather involve determinations about whether the accused has violated school policy. These commenters described Supreme Court cases requiring a higher standard of evidence (such as clear and convincing evidence) in only a narrow set of cases implicating particularly important interests,[1438] such as civil commitment, deportation, denaturalization, termination of parental rights, and similar cases, and commenters argued that school disciplinary proceedings do not implicate uniquely important interests that would warrant a heightened evidentiary standard.[1439] A few commenters argued that potential damage to future career prospects does not justify a higher standard because the preponderance of the evidence standard applies to Federal research misconduct cases, civil anti-fraud proceedings, and professional discipline cases.[1440]

One commenter asserted that the clear and convincing evidence standard is unfairly vague compared to the preponderance of the evidence standard, and can increase ambiguity in situations where there is already distrust of sexual assault survivors. This commenter asserted that schools often do not have capacity to thoroughly undertake investigations and uncover corroborative evidence, so the preponderance of the evidence standard is the most appropriate standard. Commenters expressed concern that economically disadvantaged students might not have the ability to access resources immediately after being raped or assaulted, and thus might not be able to obtain evidence that courts deem to meet a clear and convincing evidence standard. Another commenter expressed concern that applying a heightened standard for sexual misconduct could inadvertently set up young men to fail once they enter the corporate world, where a zero-tolerance approach applies.

Discussion: The Department acknowledges the arguments raised by many commenters that the Department should mandate a preponderance of the evidence standard in Title IX proceedings for reasons including fairness, consistency with civil litigation, and consistency with other civil rights laws including Title VI and Title VII. As to the sufficiency of evidence to meet a clear and convincing evidence standard, the Department appreciates the opportunity to clarify that neither the preponderance of the evidence standard, nor the clear and convincing evidence standard, requires corroborating evidence.[1441] We recognize, as have many commenters, that sexual harassment situations may arise under circumstances where the only available evidence is the statement of each party involved. A recipient is obligated to objectively evaluate all relevant evidence, including inculpatory and exculpatory evidence.[1442] The decision-maker can reach a determination regarding responsibility under a preponderance of the evidence standard, or a clear and convincing evidence standard, based on objective evaluation of party statements, with or without evidence that corroborates either party's statements.[1443] As discussed previously, a standard of evidence represents the ''degree of confidence'' that a decision-maker must have in the conclusion reached;[1444] a standard of evidence does not dictate the nature of available evidence that might lead a decision-maker to reach the designated level of confidence.

The statutory text of Title IX does not dictate a standard of evidence to be used by recipients in investigations of sexual harassment. The Department's 2001 Guidance was silent on an appropriate standard of evidence during Title IX grievance procedures,[1445] although the withdrawn 2011 Dear Colleague Letter took the position that using a clear and convincing evidence standard violates Title IX because only a preponderance of the evidence standard is consistent with resolution of civil rights claims.[1446]

It is true that civil litigation generally uses the preponderance of the evidence standard (although a clear and convincing evidence standard is applied in some civil litigation issues),[1447] and that Title IX grievance processes are analogous to civil litigation in some ways. However, it is also true that Title IX grievance processes (as prescribed under these final regulations) do not have the same set of procedures available in civil litigation. For example, many recipients choose not to allow active participation by counsel; there are no comprehensive rules of evidence or rules of civil procedure in Title IX grievance processes that allow and govern pretrial motion practice; and Title IX grievance processes do not afford parties the same discovery tools available under rules of civil procedure. The Department does not wish to force schools, colleges, and universities to become de facto civil courts by imposing all the features of civil litigation onto the Title IX grievance process; rather, the Department has included in the § 106.45 grievance process those procedural protections the Department has determined necessary to serve the critical interests of creating a consistent, fair process promoting reliable outcomes. While selecting a standard of evidence is important to ensuring a transparent, fair, reliable process, the Department has determined that a recipient may apply either the preponderance of the evidence standard, or the clear and convincing evidence standard, to fairly and accurately resolve formal complaints of sexual harassment. The Department believes that recipients reasonably may conclude that the preponderance of the evidence standard is more appropriate (perhaps for the reasons advocated by commenters) or that the clear and convincing evidence standard is more appropriate (perhaps for the reasons advocated by other commenters). The Department believes that either standard of evidence, in combination with the rights and protections required under § 106.45, creates a consistent, fair process under which recipients can reach accurate determinations regarding responsibility. Factually accurate outcomes are critical in sexual harassment cases, where both parties face potentially life-altering consequences from the outcome, and either standard of evidence allowed under these final regulations reduces the risk of a factually inaccurate outcome. ''Being labeled a sex offender by a university has both an immediate and lasting impact on a student's life'' may affect ''educational and employment opportunities down the road''.[1448] When a finding of responsibility is erroneous, such consequences are unjust. At the same time, when a respondent is found not responsible for sexual harassment, the complainant receives no remedy restoring the complainant's equal access to education,[1449] with immediate and lasting impact on the complainant's life, which may affect educational and employment opportunities down the road. When the finding of non-responsibility is erroneous, such consequences are unjust. A complainant ''deserves a reliable, accurate outcome as much as'' a respondent.[1450]

The Department disagrees that the preponderance of the evidence standard means that complainants and respondents are treated ''equally'' or placed ''on a level playing field.'' Where the evidence in a case is ''equal'' or ''level'' or ''in equipoise,'' the preponderance of the evidence standard results in a finding that the respondent is not responsible.[1451]

The Department recognizes that consistency with respect to administrative enforcement of Title IX and other civil rights laws (such as Title VI and Title VII) is desirable. However, these final regulations focus on furthering Title IX's non-discrimination mandate and address challenges unique to recipients' responses to sexual harassment. In this regard the Department has determined that recipients should retain flexibility to select the standard of evidence that they believe is most appropriate, because either of the two standards of evidence permitted under these final regulations may be used to produce reliable outcomes. The Department does not believe this approach to a standard of evidence under Title IX is in conflict with statutory or regulatory requirements under Title VI or Title VII that may apply to recipients who also have obligations under Title IX. Similarly, while VAWA authorizes private rights of action that (similarly to judicially implied private rights of action under Title VI and Title IX) use a preponderance of the evidence standard in civil litigation exercising those rights of action, these final regulations do not impact the standard of evidence that applies in civil litigation under any statute. For the reasons explained above the Department believes that either the preponderance of the evidence standard, or the clear and convincing evidence standard, is an appropriate standard in Title IX grievance processes, which differs from civil litigation. Even as to ways in which a Title IX grievance process is similar to civil litigation, both standards of evidence (the preponderance of the evidence standard and the clear and convincing evidence standard) are used in various types of civil litigation.

As many commenters have noted, a Title IX grievance process differs in purpose and context from criminal, civil, and administrative agency proceedings. A Title IX grievance process serves a unique purpose (i.e., reaching accurate factual determinations about whether sexual harassment must be remedied by restoring a victim's equal access to education) in a unique context (i.e., decisions must be reached by schools, colleges, and universities whose primary function is to educate, not to serve as courts or administrative bodies). A Title IX grievance process is different from criminal, civil, and administrative proceedings, yet bears similarities to each. The preponderance of the evidence standard, and the clear and convincing evidence standard, each are used in various civil and administrative proceedings.[1452] Additionally, recipients have historically used either the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard for a variety of student and employee misconduct proceedings, under a variety of rationales for choosing one or the other.[1453] The Department believes that a recipient could view either standard as appropriate in the context of Title IX proceedings, and the Department agrees that either standard may be fairly applied to reach accurate outcomes, and thus these final regulations allow recipients to select the preponderance of the evidence standard, or the clear and convincing evidence standard, for use in resolving formal complaints of sexual harassment under § 106.45.[1454]

Selecting a standard of evidence represents a statement about the ''degree of confidence'' that a recipient believes its decision-makers should have in reaching determinations regarding responsibility in Title IX sexual harassment cases. We do not agree that the recipient's selection of one standard over the other implies a belief that any party is lying or untruthful, and regardless of the applicable standard of evidence, Title IX personnel must avoid prejudgment of the facts at issue[1455] and reach determinations regarding responsibility based on objective evaluation of the evidence without drawing credibility determinations based on a party's status as a complainant or respondent.[1456] We also reiterate that regardless of the applicable standard of evidence, the burden of proof rests on the recipient, not on either party.[1457]

We disagree that the clear and convincing evidence standard is unfairly vague. The clear and convincing evidence standard is a widely recognized standard of evidence used in a variety of civil and administrative proceedings,[1458] and [1453] As many commenters noted, there exist valid reasons for supporting the preponderance of the evidence standard, and for supporting the clear and convincing evidence standard, with respect to sexual misconduct allegations. Commenters, for instance, cited this debate by citing to: Nancy Chi Cantalupo & John Villasenor, Is a Higher Standard Needed for Campus Sexual Assault Cases?, The New York Times (Jan. 4, 2017). The final regulations permit recipients to select between these standards to best meet the legal, cultural, and pedagogical needs of the recipient's community with respect to the degree of certainty the recipient expects decision-makers to have when reaching determinations regarding responsibility for sexual harassment allegations.

[1454] For reasons explained in the ''Mandating a Higher Standard of Evidence'' subsection of this ''Section 106.45(b)(7)(i) Standard of Evidence and Directed Question 6'' subsection of this preamble, the Department does not permit recipients to select a standard of evidence higher than clear and convincing evidence (such as the criminally used ''beyond a reasonable doubt'' standard).

many recipients have historically used clear and convincing evidence as an evidentiary standard for various types of student or employee misconduct.[1459]

We disagree that a recipient who selects the clear and convincing evidence standard for resolution of sexual harassment cases is failing to prepare students for future careers in the corporate world. While corporate employers may or may not choose to, or be required to, use the clear and convincing evidence standard for sexual misconduct proceedings involving employees, workplaces differ from educational environments and different laws and policies govern discrimination complaints and misconduct proceedings in each context. Whether or not the commenter correctly characterized corporate environments as having ''zero tolerance policies,'' we note that nothing in these final regulations precludes a recipient from adopting a zero tolerance policy (with respect to harassment or any other misconduct); these final regulations apply only to a recipient's obligations to respond to sexual harassment (as defined in § 106.30) of which the recipient knows and which occurs in the recipient's education program or activity.[1460] As noted in § 106.45(b)(3)(i), even if a recipient must dismiss allegations of sexual harassment in a formal complaint under these final regulations, such dismissal is only for Title IX purposes and does not preclude action under another provision of the recipient's code of conduct.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(7)(i) of the final regulations such that recipients have the choice of either applying the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard, and § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) requires a recipient to make that choice applicable to all formal complaints of sexual harassment, including those against employees and faculty. We have removed the limitation contained in the NPRM that would have permitted recipients to use the preponderance of the evidence standard only if they used that standard for non-sexual misconduct that has the same maximum disciplinary sanction.

Improving Accuracy of Outcomes

Comments: A number of commenters asserted that the preponderance of the evidence standard increases the overall accuracy of the system because it is an error-minimizing standard and argued that the clear and convincing evidence standard would increase false negative errors to a greater extent than it reduces false positive errors, thus reducing the accuracy of Title IX outcomes.[1461] Other commenters pointed to a study explaining that use of the preponderance of the evidence standard increases false positive errors.[1462]

Discussion: The Department shares commenters' concerns that increasing the overall accuracy of determinations of responsibility in Title IX proceedings is critical and that minimizing either type of error (i.e., false positives and false negatives) is important and desirable. The Department does not believe that evidence is conclusive either way regarding whether using the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard as the standard of evidence in Title IX proceedings best reduces risk of error, in part because studies that may shed light on that question assume features and processes in place that differ from those prescribed by the final regulations under § 106.45. The final regulations permit recipients to select either the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard for application to formal complaints of sexual harassment in the recipient's educational community, because in combination with the other procedural features of the § 106.45, either standard of evidence can be applied fairly to result in accurate outcomes.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(7)(i) of the final regulations such that recipients have the choice of either applying the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard, and § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) requires a recipient to make that choice applicable to all formal complaints of sexual harassment, including those against employees and faculty. We have removed the limitation contained in the NPRM that would have permitted recipients to use the preponderance of the evidence standard only if they used that standard for non-sexual misconduct that has the same maximum disciplinary sanction.

Safety Concerns

Comments: Many commenters contended that the clear and convincing evidence standard will make campuses less safe, chill reporting, and harm already vulnerable students.[1463] Commenters argued that the clear and convincing evidence standard will discourage survivors, particularly students of color, LGBTQ students, and students with disabilities, from reporting because this standard unjustly favors respondents. Commenters argued that the clear and convincing evidence standard may result in a lower number of respondents found responsible and removed from campus, thus increasing the risk of victim re-traumatization by encountering their perpetrator and possibly resulting in ''constructive expulsion,'' where survivors leave school to avoid seeing their perpetrator. Commenters argued that the clear and convincing evidence standard may perversely incentivize perpetrators to Within the range of standards, clear and convincing evidence is situated to 'protect particularly important individual interests in various civil cases' that involve more than 'mere loss of money.' Though the meaning of 'clear and convincing' varies by state, one can generally articulate the standard as 'persuad[ing] the [factfinder] that the proposition is highly probable, or . . . produc[ing] in the mind of the factfinder a firm belief or conviction that the allegations in question are true.' attack again because of the perception they will not be held accountable.

Discussion: Under the final regulations, complainants (or third parties) may report sexual harassment triggering a recipient's mandatory obligation to offer the complainant supportive measures and inform the complainant about the option of filing a formal complaint; complainants are not required to file a formal complaint or participate in a grievance process in order to report sexual harassment and receive supportive measures.[1464] Thus, regardless of how a complainant perceives or anticipates the experience of a grievance process, a complainant has the right to report sexual harassment and receive supportive measures. If or when a complainant also decides to file a formal complaint initiating a grievance process against a respondent, § 106.45 ensures that the burden of gathering evidence, and the burden of proof, remain on the recipient and not on the complainant (or respondent). Complainants who participate in a grievance process receive the strong, clear procedural rights and protections in § 106.45 including, among other things, the right to gather, present, review, and respond to evidence, the right to review and respond to the recipient's investigative report summarizing relevant evidence, and the right to pose questions to be answered by a respondent to further the complainant's perspective about the case and what the outcome should be, and the right to an advisor of choice to advise and assist the complainant throughout the process.[1465] Whether the recipient selects a preponderance of the evidence standard, or a clear and convincing evidence standard, complainants have the right and opportunity to participate in the process on an equal basis with the respondent. Regardless of which standard of evidence a recipient selects, we reiterate that neither standard requires corroborating evidence in order to reach a determination regarding responsibility; the standard of evidence reflects the ''degree of confidence'' that a decision-maker has in correctness of the factual conclusions reached.[1466]

The Department understands that whether a determination regarding responsibility is reached using the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard, the outcome reflects the weight and persuasiveness of the available, relevant evidence in the case. We have added § 106.71 in the final regulations to caution recipients not to draw conclusions about any party's truthfulness during a grievance process based solely on the outcome of the case. The final regulations do not preclude a recipient from keeping supportive measures in place even after a determination that a respondent is not responsible, so complainants do not necessarily need to be left in constant contact with the respondent, regardless of the result of a grievance process. The Department understands the potential for loss of educational access for complainants, and for respondents, in situations where sexual harassment allegations are not resolved accurately. The Department is not aware of a Federal appellate court holding that the clear and convincing evidence standard is required to satisfy constitutional due process or fundamental fairness in Title IX proceedings, and the Department is not aware of a Federal appellate court holding that the preponderance of the evidence standard is required under Title IX. Because recipients have historically used either the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard in sexual misconduct disciplinary proceedings, and because studies are inconclusive about which standard is more likely to reduce the risk of erroneous outcomes, the Department concludes that recipients must select and consistently apply a standard of evidence that is not lower than the preponderance of the evidence standard and not higher than the clear and convincing evidence standard, but that either the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard may be applied to reach accurate determinations in a Title IX grievance process, consistent with constitutional due process and fundamental fairness and with Title IX's non-discrimination mandate. The Department believes that the predictable, fair grievance process prescribed under § 106.45 will convey to complainants and respondents that the recipient treats formal complaints of sexual harassment seriously and aims to reach a factually accurate conclusion; the Department does not agree that using one standard of evidence rather than the other conveys to respondents that Title IX sexual harassment can be perpetrated without consequence.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(7)(i) of the final regulations such that recipients have the choice of either applying the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard, and § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) requires a recipient to make that choice applicable to all formal complaints of sexual harassment, including those against employees and faculty. We have removed the limitation contained in the NPRM that would have permitted recipients to use the preponderance of the evidence standard only if they used that standard for non-sexual misconduct that has the same maximum disciplinary sanction. We have added § 106.71 prohibiting retaliation for exercising rights under Title IX and specifying that while a recipient may punish a party for making bad-faith materially false statements during a grievance process, the outcome of the case alone cannot be the basis for concluding that a party made a bad-faith materially false statement.

Consistency of Standards of Evidence Across Recipients

Comments: A few commenters raised concerns that allowing recipients to choose between two standards of evidence will lead to inconsistent systems across the country, which may complicate campus crime reporting under the Clery Act and make it harder for prospective students to compare crime statistics across campuses. Commenters argued that the Department should not allow justice to apply unequally across the country.

Discussion: These final regulations do not alter requirements under the Clery Act or its implementing regulations. The Department disagrees that data gathering and reporting under the Clery Act will be affected by the standard of evidence selected by a recipient for resolving formal complaints of sexual harassment under Title IX. A recipient's obligations to report under the Clery Act depend on when a crime has been reported to the recipient and do not depend on the outcome of any disciplinary proceeding that results from a person's report of a crime.

The final regulations' approach to the standard of evidence for Title IX grievance processes (whereby a recipient may select either the preponderance of the evidence standard, or the clear and convincing evidence standard), may result in some recipients selecting one standard and other recipients selecting the other standard. The Department disagrees that this approach results in ''unequal justice'' across the country. The Department believes that this approach to the standard of evidence maintains consistency with respect to all Title IX grievance processes, across recipients, because all grievance processes regardless of which standard of evidence a recipient applies, are fair processes likely to lead to accurate determinations regarding responsibility.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(7)(i) of the final regulations such that recipients have the choice of either applying the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard, and § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) requires a recipient to make that choice applicable to all formal complaints of sexual harassment, including those against employees and faculty. We have removed the limitation contained in the NPRM that would have permitted recipients to use the preponderance of the evidence standard only if they used that standard for non-sexual misconduct that has the same maximum disciplinary sanction.

Standards of Evidence Below the Preponderance of the Evidence

Comments: A few commenters proposed that the Department consider lower standards of evidence than the preponderance of the evidence standard. One commenter suggested ''substantial evidence,'' or enough relevant evidence that a reasonable person would find supports the fact-finder's conclusion. Another commenter suggested ''reasonable cause'' and noted that child welfare agencies protecting children from abuse use the ''reasonable cause'' standard, which is lower than the preponderance of the evidence standard.

Discussion: As discussed above, the Department does not wish to be more prescriptive than necessary to ensure a consistent grievance process yielding accurate outcomes, so that recipients are held responsible for redressing sexual harassment as a form of sex discrimination under Title IX. As commenters pointed out, the two standards of evidence between which the final regulations permit recipients to choose are not the only possible standards of evidence that could be used in Title IX proceedings. For example, some commenters urged adoption of the higher, criminal ''beyond a reasonable doubt'' standard, while other commenters noted that preponderance of the evidence standard is not ''the lowest'' possible standard that could be used, because lower standards such as ''substantial evidence,'' ''reasonable cause,'' or ''probable cause'' are used, or have been used, in student discipline and certain types of legal proceedings. The Department believes that students and employees deserve clarity as to the standard of evidence a recipient will apply during the grievance process and that recipients should be permitted as much flexibility as reasonably possible while ensuring reliable outcomes in these high-stakes cases. For reasons described above, the Department believes that either the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard can be applied within the § 106.45 grievance process and yield reliable outcomes, but does not believe that a standard lower than the preponderance of the evidence standard, or higher than the clear and convincing evidence standard, would result in a fair process or reliable outcomes.[1467]

As discussed above, the Department does not believe that the highest possible standard (beyond a reasonable doubt) should apply in a noncriminal proceeding such as a Title IX grievance process where, as commenters have accurately pointed out, a respondent's liberty interests are not at stake.[1468] The Supreme Court has cautioned against applying the ''beyond a reasonable doubt'' standard to noncriminal proceedings.[1469] At the same time, the Department does not believe that a standard lower than preponderance (such as substantial evidence or probable cause) should apply to the Title IX grievance process either, because the stakes are high for both parties in a Title IX process; without a determination based on a probability of accuracy greater than 50 percent (i.e., more likely than not to be true), the Department does not believe that an outcome can be deemed reliable or perceived as legitimate. Without a reliable outcome, the parties, recipients, Department, and the public cannot confidently assess whether a recipient has responded to sex discrimination in the recipient's education program or activity by providing remedies to victims and taking disciplinary action against perpetrators with respect to sexual harassment allegations.

Changes: None.

Questioning the Department's Legal Authority

Comments: Several commenters contended that the NPRM's choice of evidence standard exceeds the Department's legal authority. One commenter argued that allowing the clear and convincing evidence standard for sexual harassment cases but a lower preponderance of the evidence standard for non-sexual harassment cases could violate the Fourteenth Amendment Equal Protection Clause. Other commenters suggested that allowing a clear and convincing evidence standard is inconsistent with Title IX's statutory objectives and would not effectuate the prohibition on sex discrimination. One commenter stated that the Supreme Court, not the Department, must ultimately determine the applicable Title IX standard of evidence. Another commenter suggested that the NPRM's approach to the standard of evidence violates the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, under which the U.S. is obligated to prohibit and eliminate sex discrimination. One commenter asserted that the Department lacks authority over evidence standards at all, and that the Department should instead defer to recipients' administrative discretion to set their own evidentiary standards. One commenter argued that the Department lacks authority over negotiated agreements between recipient management and employees, and the Department's attempt to supersede these agreements with mandated evidentiary standards is regulatory overreach. This commenter emphasized that recipients did not contemplate such a requirement when accepting Federal funding.

Discussion: Contrary to the claims made by some commenters, the Department believes the final regulations address the issue of what standard of evidence should apply in Title IX proceedings, in a reasonable manner that falls within the Department's regulatory authority. The [1467] See Lavinia M. Weizel, The Process That Is Due: Preponderance of The Evidence as The Standard of Proof For University Adjudications of Student-On-Student Sexual Assault Complaints, 53 Boston Coll. L. Rev. 1613, 1635 (2012) (analyzing court cases that have criticized colleges for using a standard of evidence lower than the preponderance of the evidence standard, such as what many schools have referred to as ''substantial evidence'' because using a standard lower than the preponderance of the evidence standard ''leaves the fact-finder adrift to be persuaded by individual prejudices rather than by the weight of the evidence presented'') (internal quotation marks and citations omitted).

[1468] The clear and convincing evidence standard is an ''intermediate standard'' that while less commonly used than the preponderance of the evidence standard, is sometimes used in civil cases ''involving allegations of fraud or some other quasi-criminal wrongdoing by the defendant'' that justify reducing ''the risk to the defendant of having his reputation tarnished erroneously.'' Addington v. Texas, 441 U.S. 418, 424 (1979) (internal quotation marks and citations omitted). As some commenters observed, the consequences for a respondent in a Title IX case often involve allegations of quasi-criminal wrongdoing with possible lifelong impact on a respondent's reputation.

[1469] See, e.g., Santosky v. Kramer, 455 U.S. 745, 768 (1982) (noting that the Supreme Court hesitates to apply the ''unique standard'' of beyond a reasonable doubt ''too broadly or casually in noncriminal cases'') (internal quotation marks and citations omitted).

Department acknowledges that the statutory text of Title IX does not reference, much less dictate, a standard of evidence to be used by recipients to resolve allegations of sexual harassment. The Department's authority to regulate on the subject of sexual harassment, including how a recipient responds when a complainant files a formal complaint raising allegations of sexual harassment against a respondent, flows from the Department's statutory directive to promulgate rules and regulations to effectuate the purposes of Title IX.[1470] Those purposes have been described by the Supreme Court as preventing Federal funds from supporting education programs or activities that tolerate sex discriminatory practices and providing individuals with effective protections against such sex discriminatory practices.[1471]

Where sexual harassment allegations present contested narratives regarding a particular incident between a complainant and respondent, accurately determining the truth of the allegations in a non-sex biased manner is critical to ensuring that a recipient responds appropriately by providing the complainant with remedies that restore or preserve the complainant's equal access to education. As noted previously in this preamble, a complainant is a victim of sexual harassment where a fair process has reached an accurate determination that the respondent perpetrated sexual harassment against the complainant and the final regulations require recipients to provide such complainants with remedies. For the reasons discussed above, the Department has determined that a fair, reliable outcome requires that a recipient notify its students and employees in advance of the standard of evidence the recipient will apply in sexual harassment grievance processes, and the Department has further determined that either the preponderance of the evidence standard, or the clear and convincing evidence standard (but not a standard lower than preponderance of the evidence or higher than clear and convincing evidence) can produce an accurate determination. Both of the standards of evidence available for recipients to choose under these final regulations are standards common to civil proceedings, and not to criminal proceedings. The difference between the two options is a difference in the degree of confidence that each recipient decides that a decision-maker must have in the factual correctness of the conclusions reached in Title IX sexual harassment cases; that is, the difference between having confidence that a conclusion is based on facts that are more likely true than not,[1472] or having confidence that a conclusion is based on facts that are highly probable to be true.[1473] Thus, the Department's provisions regarding selection and application of a standard of evidence effectuates the dual purposes of Title IX—preventing Federal dollars from flowing to schools that fail to protect victims of sexual harassment, and providing individuals with effective protections against discriminatory practices that occur by failure to accurately determine who has been victimized by sexual harassment. At the same time, these provisions regarding selection and application of a standard of evidence are consistent with constitutional due process and fundamental fairness. Fair adversarial procedures increase the probability that the truth of allegations will be accurately determined,[1474] and reduce the likelihood that impermissible sex bias will affect the outcome.

Acknowledging the arguments from commenters urging the Department to mandate one or the other standard, the Department has determined that either the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard reasonably can be applied as part of the fair procedures prescribed under § 106.45.

The Department further notes that the Supreme Court has specifically approved of the Department's authority to regulate specific requirements under Title IX even when those requirements are not referenced under the statute and even when the administratively imposed requirements do not represent a definition of sex discrimination under the statute; the Department has wide latitude to issue requirements for the purpose of furthering Title IX's non-discrimination mandate, including measures designed to make it less likely that sex discrimination will occur, even if a Federal court would not hold the recipient accountable to the same requirements in a private lawsuit under Title IX.[1475] For example, the Department's existing regulations in 34 CFR 106 have, since 1975, required recipients to have in place grievance procedures for the ''prompt and equitable'' resolution of complaints that a recipient is committing sex discrimination,[1476] even though the Title IX statute does not require recipients to have in place any grievance procedures to handle sex discrimination complaints.

The Department rejects the contention made by one commenter that the approach to the standard of evidence

As noted previously, the Department is not aware of a Federal appellate court holding that the preponderance of the evidence standard is required in order to be consistent with Title IX's non-discrimination mandate, and is not aware of a Federal appellate court holding that the clear and convincing evidence standard is required to satisfy constitutional due process or fundamental fairness in Title IX proceedings. The Department believes that either of these two standards of evidence may be applied by a recipient in a Title IX grievance process because both are consistent with Title IX's non-discrimination and due process protections.

[1472] A preponderance of the evidence standard of evidence is understood to mean concluding that a fact is more likely than not to be true. E.g., Concrete Pipe & Prod. of Cal., Inc. v. Constr. Laborers Pension Tr. for S. Cal., 508 U.S. 602, 622 (1993) (a preponderance of the evidence standard ''requires the trier of fact to believe that the existence of a fact is more probable than its nonexistence'') (internal quotation marks and citation omitted).

[1475] See, e.g., Gebser, 524 U.S. at 291–92 (refusing to allow plaintiff to pursue a claim under Title IX based on the school's failure to comply with the Department's regulatory requirement to adopt and publish prompt and equitable grievance procedures, stating ''And in any event, the failure to promulgate a grievance procedure does not itself constitute 'discrimination' under Title IX. Of course, the Department of Education could enforce the requirement administratively: Agencies generally have authority to promulgate and enforce requirements that effectuate the statute's non-discrimination mandate, 20 U.S.C. 1682, even if those requirements do not purport to represent a definition of discrimination under the statute.'').

[1476] The final regulations revise 34 CFR 106.8(b), in ways discussed in the ''Section 106.8(b) Dissemination of Policy'' subsection of the ''Clarifying Amendments to Existing Regulations'' section of this preamble. Under the final regulations, recipients still must have grievance procedures that provide for the prompt and equitable resolutions of complaints from students and employees alleging sex discrimination. The final regulations update § 106.8 to clarify that ''prompt and equitable'' grievance procedures must still exist for sex discrimination that is not sexual harassment, and that recipients must also notify students, employees, and others that the recipient has a grievance process that complies with § 106.45 for the purpose of resolving formal complaints of sexual harassment.

contained in § 106.45(b)(7)(i) of the final regulations may violate the Fourteenth Amendment Equal Protection Clause. Nothing in the final regulations dictates what standard of evidence recipients use in non-sexual harassment cases, so a recipient does not necessarily treat different types of cases differently because of the final regulations. Further, the Department notes that the appropriate standard of review under an Equal Protection challenge would be the rational basis test, which upholds a State action that makes distinctions that are not based on suspect classifications, if there is any reasonable set of facts that could provide a rational basis for the action.[1477] The Department has determined that allowing recipients to select one of two standards of evidence,[1478] either of which can be applied within a fair grievance process to reach accurate determinations, is rationally related to the legitimate interest of ensuring reliable outcomes in Title IX sexual harassment cases.

With respect to obligations under international law such as the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, nothing in the final regulations impairs any U.S. obligation to prohibit and eliminate sex discrimination, nor does the Department see any conflict between recipients' compliance with the final regulations, and U.S. compliance with applicable international laws or treaties.[1479]

We discuss the implications of the final regulations' approach to the standard of evidence with respect to a recipient's employees and CBAs in the ''Same Evidentiary Standard in Student and Faculty Cases'' subsection of this section, above. For further discussion of the Department's application of these final regulations to employees, see the ''Section 106.6(f) Title VII and Directed Question 3 (Application to Employees)'' subsection of the ''Clarifying Amendments to Existing Regulations'' section of this preamble. For reasons discussed in the ''Spending Clause'' subsection of the ''Miscellaneous'' section of this preamble, the Department disagrees that these final regulations exceed the Department's regulatory authority to promulgate rules that effectuate the purposes of Title IX with respect to education programs or activities that receive Federal financial assistance.

Changes: None.

Alternative Approaches and Clarification Requests

Comments: Several commenters proposed alternative regulatory language for § 106.45(b)(7)(i). One commenter urged the Department to explicitly address both sexual harassment and ''sexual misconduct'' in the standard of evidence provisions. This commenter agreed that it was appropriate to require the same standard of evidence in student and faculty cases but also believed that the Department should apply the same due process rights for students and faculty alike. This commenter also requested that the Department include ''staff'' and not just ''faculty'' in this provision.

One commenter requested that the Department explicitly define the preponderance of the evidence standard as satisfied where the conclusion is supported by persuasive, relevant, and substantial evidence and the procedures are both transparent and fair. This commenter rejected the notion that the preponderance of the evidence standard is 50 percent ''plus a feather.'' One commenter suggested that if in a particular case the preponderance of the evidence standard is satisfied, but not the clear and convincing evidence standard, then the Department should allow recipients to suspend or expel the respondent but not put a permanent notation on the respondent's transcript that would prevent transfer to another school. The commenter argued that this strikes a balance between protecting wrongly convicted students and protecting victims seeking to continue their education. One commenter requested that the Department adopt the provision as written, but also require recipients to provide a written explanation as to why it is necessary to use one evidentiary standard instead of another. Another commenter argued that the clear and convincing evidence standard is unclear, and the Department should explicitly define it in the final regulations. And one commenter suggested that the Department include statistics in the final regulations to justify changing its approach to evidentiary standards.

Commenters also raised several questions regarding evidentiary standards. One commenter inquired as to whether the requirement that if the preponderance of the evidence standard is used in Title IX cases then it must be used in non-Title IX cases with the same maximum punishment is satisfied where the preponderance of the evidence standard is used for: (a) All conduct code violations with same maximum punishment; (b) most of such conduct code violations; (c) more than one but less than a majority of such violations; (d) even a single such violation; (e) a penalty phase only (such as to impose expulsion); (f) student infractions governed by a separate policy than the student conduct code; or (g) student conduct code violations, but not for other forms of discrimination or harassment by students. The same commenter asked whether the requirement that the same standard of evidence be used for Title IX complaints against students and faculty means recipients must use the clear and convincing evidence standard for student cases if the clear and convincing evidence standard is applied to: (a) All Title IX complaints against employees; (b) Title IX complaints against a majority of employees; (c) Title IX complaints against even a single employee: (d) Title IX complaints against some but not all types of misconduct by employees; (e) Title IX complaints about even a single type of misconduct; (f) complaints about employee misconduct not involving alleged discrimination and/or harassment by employees towards students; (g) complaints about employee misconduct not involving alleged discrimination and/or harassment by employees towards other employees, (h) some, but not all, aspects of complaints against employees (for example, where the preponderance of the evidence standard is used to determine whether misconduct occurred, but the clear and convincing evidence standard is required for some forms of discipline against a class of employees, such as revoking tenure for tenured faculty).

Discussion: The Department notes that ''sexual harassment'' is defined in § 106.30 of the final regulations, and this definition encompasses a wide range of sexual misconduct. The Department does not believe that the term ''sexual misconduct'' would be more appropriate than ''sexual harassment'' in these regulations, because the Supreme Court interpretations of Title IX refer to sexual harassment. Furthermore, § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) and § 106.45(b)(7)(i) mandate that recipients use the same standard of evidence to reach determinations regarding responsibility in response to formal complaints against [1477] F.C.C. v. Beach Commc'ns, Inc., 508 U.S. 307, 313 (1993) (holding that in areas of social and economic policy, statutory classification that neither proceeds along suspect lines nor infringes fundamental constitutional rights must be upheld against equal protection challenge if there is any reasonably conceivable state of facts that could provide rational basis for classification).

[1478] As noted above, the final regulations removed the NPRM condition that a recipient only use the preponderance of the evidence standard if the recipient also uses that standard in non-sexual harassment code of conduct proceedings.

students as they do for formal complaints against employees, including all staff and faculty, and the final regulations also require the other provisions in § 106.45 to apply to all formal complaints of sexual harassment whether against students and employees, including faculty.

The Department declines to provide definitions of the ''preponderance of the evidence'' standard and the ''clear and convincing evidence'' standard. The Department believes that each standard of evidence referenced in the final regulations has a commonly understood meaning in other legal contexts and intends the ''preponderance of the evidence'' standard to have its traditional meaning in the civil litigation context and the ''clear and convincing evidence'' standard to have its traditional meaning in the subset of civil litigation and administrative proceedings where that standard is used.[1480]

For discussion of transcript notations, see the ''Transcript Notations'' subsection of the ''Determinations Regarding Responsibility'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble.

The Department expects that recipients will select a standard of evidence based on the recipient's belief about which standard best serves the interests of the recipient's educational community, or because State law requires the recipient to apply one or the other standard, or because the recipient has already bargained with unionized employees for a particular standard of evidence in misconduct proceedings. The Department declines to require recipients to explain why a recipient has selected one or the other standard of evidence, though nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient from communicating its rationale to its educational community.

The Department has examined statistics, data, and information regarding standards of evidence submitted by commenters through public comment on the NPRM, and has considered commenters' arguments in favor of the preponderance of the evidence standard, in favor of the clear and convincing evidence standard, and in favor of other standards of evidence. For reasons described above, the Department has determined that the approach to the standard of evidence contained in § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) and § 106.45(b)(7)(i) of the final regulations represents the most effective way of legally obligating recipients to select a standard of evidence for use in resolving formal complaints of sexual harassment under Title IX to ensure a fair, reliable grievance process without unnecessarily mandating that a recipient select one standard over the other.

As discussed above, and after careful consideration of many comments we found to be persuasive, the Department removed the NPRM's requirement that recipients may only apply the preponderance of the evidence standard to reach determinations regarding responsibility in Title IX proceedings if they use that same standard to address non-sexual misconduct cases that carry the same maximum punishment. However, the final regulations retain the NPRM's requirement that recipients use the same standard of evidence to reach determinations of responsibility in Title IX proceedings against students as they do for Title IX proceedings against employees including faculty, for reasons discussed above. With respect to the questions raised by one commenter as to the scope of this requirement, the Department wishes to clarify that the same standard of evidence must apply to each formal complaint alleging sexual harassment against employees as it does for each formal complaint alleging sexual harassment against students. In short, under the final regulations the same standard of evidence will apply to all formal complaints of sexual harassment under Title IX responded to by a particular recipient, whether the respondent is a student or employee.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(7)(i) of the final regulations such that recipients have the choice of either applying the preponderance of the evidence standard or the clear and convincing evidence standard, and § 106.45(b)(1)(vii) requires a recipient to make that choice applicable to all formal complaints of sexual harassment, including those against employees and faculty. We have removed the limitation contained in the NPRM that would have permitted recipients to use the preponderance of the evidence standard only if they used that standard for non-sexual misconduct that has the same maximum disciplinary sanction.

Section 106.45(b)(7)(ii) Written Determination Regarding Responsibility Must Include Certain Details

Comments: A number of commenters expressed support for § 106.45(b)(7) because it requires the decision-maker to provide a written determination regarding responsibility. Commenters stated that putting decisions in writing will prevent confusion as to what was decided and provide a written record for appeals or other administrative needs, or judicial review. Commenters asserted that a written determination will protect due process and prevent schools from inserting bias into proceedings. Commenters expressed support for § 106.45(b)(7) due to concern that institutions were ''railroading'' respondents.

One commenter argued that § 106.45(b)(7) is a reasonable means of reducing sex discrimination because requiring decision-makers to give reasons for their decisions has been shown to enhance the thoroughness of decision making and to improve the willingness of decision-makers to engage in self-critical thinking,[1481] a concept well known to the legal system.[1482] The commenter further argued that requiring reason-giving tends to foster independent decision making and reduce overconfidence in decision making,[1483] so that individual decision-makers become less susceptible to group pressure,[1484] all of which contribute to rendering more accurate decisions.

A few commenters urged the Department to also require that the written determination must include or describe contradictory facts, exculpatory evidence, all evidence presented at the hearing, and/or credibility assessments. One commenter argued that § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(C) should be revised to require findings of fact sufficient to allow the parties and any appellate reviewer to understand the facts tending to support or refute the determination.

Some commenters argued that requiring a written determination is too burdensome, especially for smaller institutions and for elementary and secondary schools.

Discussion: The Department believes § 106.45(b)(7) serves the important function of ensuring that both parties know the reasons for the outcome of a Title IX grievance process, and agrees that requiring decision-makers to give written reasoning helps ensure independent judgment and decision making free from bias. Section 106.45(b)(7)(i) requires recipients to issue a written determination regarding responsibility to foster reliability and thoroughness, and to ensure that a recipient's findings are adequately explained.

Section 106.45(b)(7)(ii) mandates that the written determination must include certain key elements so that the parties have a thorough understanding of the investigative process and information considered by the recipient in reaching conclusions. Section 106.45(b)(7)(iii) requires that this written determination be provided to the parties simultaneously. The substance of these provisions generally tracks language in the Clery Act regulations at 34 CFR 668.46(k)(2)(v) and (k)(3)(iv) and reflect concepts familiar to institutions of higher education that receive Federal student aid under Title IV of the Higher Education Act of 1965, as amended. The Department believes that the benefits of these provisions, including promoting transparency and equal treatment of the parties, are also important in the elementary and secondary school context, even though elementary and secondary schools are not subject to the Clery Act. Furthermore, the provisions in § 106.45(b)(7) are consistent with Department guidance, which has always been applicable to both postsecondary institutions and elementary and secondary schools. For example, the 2001 Guidance stated that an equitable grievance procedure should include providing notice to the parties of the outcome of a sexual harassment complaint,[1485] and the withdrawn 2011 Dear Colleague Letter stated that notice of the outcome should be in writing and sent to both parties concurrently.[1486]

Requiring recipients to describe, in writing, conclusions (and reasons for those conclusions) will help prevent confusion about how and why a recipient reaches determinations regarding responsibility for Title IX sexual harassment. We agree that requiring a written determination (sent simultaneously to both parties) is an important due process protection for complainants and respondents, ensuring that both parties have relevant information about the resolution of allegations of Title IX sexual harassment. Section 106.45(b)(7) also helps prevent injection of bias into Title IX sexual harassment grievance processes, by requiring transparent descriptions of the steps taken in an investigation and explanations of the reasons why objective evaluation of the evidence supports findings of facts and conclusions based on those facts. Because the Department believes that § 106.45(b)(7) is important to ensure that recipients consistently, transparently, fairly, and accurately respond to Title IX sexual harassment, the Department declines to exempt smaller institutions, or elementary and secondary schools, from the requirements of this provision. The Department believes that the requirements of this provision are reasonable, and that the burden of complying with this provision is outweighed by the benefit of a consistent, transparent Title IX grievance process for students in elementary and secondary schools, as well as students at postsecondary institutions, irrespective of the size of the institution's student body.

In order to ensure that the written determination resolves allegations that a respondent committed sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, and to avoid confusion caused by the NPRM's reference in § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(A) to a recipient's code of conduct, we have revised that provision to reference identification of ''allegations potentially constituting sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30'' instead of ''identification of sections of the recipient's code of conduct alleged to have been violated.'' Recipients retain discretion to also refer in the written determination to any provision of the recipient's own code of conduct that prohibits conduct meeting the § 106.30 definition of sexual harassment; however, this revision to § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(A) helps ensure that these final regulations are understood to apply to a recipient's response to Title IX sexual harassment, and not to apply to a recipient's response to non-Title IX types of misconduct.

We decline to expressly require the written determination to address evaluation of contradictory facts, exculpatory evidence, ''all evidence'' presented at a hearing, or how credibility assessments were reached, because the decision-maker is obligated to objectively evaluate all relevant evidence, including inculpatory and exculpatory evidence (and to avoid credibility inferences based on a person's status as a complainant, respondent, or witness), under § 106.45(b)(1)(ii). It is precisely this objective evaluation that provides the basis for the decision-maker's ''rationale'' for ''the result'' of each allegation, which must be described in the written determination under § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(E). The Department believes that § 106.45(b)(7), as revised in these final regulations, provides for a written determination adequate for the purposes of an appeal or judicial proceeding reviewing the determination regarding responsibility. We therefore decline to revise the language of this provision to specify that findings of fact must be described sufficiently to allow the parties and any appellate reviewer to understand the facts supporting or refuting the determination.

Changes: We have revised § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(A) to reference identification of allegations potentially constituting sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30, instead of referencing identification of sections of the recipient's code of conduct alleged to have been violated.

Comments: One commenter argued that requiring a written determination that describes the procedural steps of the investigation (i.e., § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(B) requiring inclusion of notifications to parties, interviews of parties and witnesses, site visits, methods used to gather evidence) has no equivalent within criminal or civil procedure. Commenters argued that this provision would be unreasonably burdensome for recipients, especially for smaller institutions and for elementary and secondary schools. Some commenters asserted that the only procedural detail that should be included in the written determination is the investigation timeline. Other commenters asserted that information about the investigation should be included in the investigative report, but not in the written determination.

One commenter argued that proposed § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(C)–(D), which required that the written determination include findings of fact supporting the determination and ''conclusions regarding the application of the recipient's code of conduct to the facts,'' would be contrary to the Administrative Procedure Act (''APA''), 5 U.S.C. 701 et seq., because the Department is not authorized to impose requirements on a recipient based whether the recipient's own code of conduct has been violated. The commenter argued that the Department's authority is strictly restricted to the application of Title IX to the facts and does not extend to application of the recipient's code of conduct to the facts.

One commenter expressed concern that the requirements related to the written determination are an example of how the proposed rules would conflate a sexual harassment investigation with disciplinary proceedings for behavioral violations. The commenter asserted that in the elementary and secondary school context, a sexual harassment investigation is designed to determine whether or not a student experienced sexual harassment and what remedies are necessary to stop the harassment, eliminate a hostile environment, prevent the harassment from reoccurring, and address any effects of the hostile environment. The commenter furthered argued that determinations of an individual student's culpability for sexual harassment should be handled under a school district's code of conduct and State student discipline due process laws.

A number of commenters expressed concerns about including ''remedies'' in the written determination, under proposed § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(E). One commenter requested a definition of the term ''remedies.'' One commenter argued that this proposed provision's reference to including ''any sanctions the recipient imposes on the respondent, and any remedies provided by the recipient to the complainant'' is consistent with FERPA. Other commenters asserted that disclosing a complainant's remedies to the respondent may violate FERPA, and would violate the complainant's right to privacy regardless of whether FERPA would allow the disclosure. Commenters asserted that including remedies in the written determination would endanger safety on campus, deter students from seeking help, deter faculty and staff from participating in the process, and subject victims to further harassment from respondents. With respect to describing sanctions and remedies, some commenters suggested adding a FERPA compliance clause to this provision, and other commenters suggested modifying this provision to mirror the Clery Act.

Commenters asserted that the Department should require the written determination to contain assurances that the school will take steps to prevent recurrence of harassment, correct the discriminatory effects of harassment, and prevent any retaliation against the complainant. Commenters argued that the effects of harassment can impact not only the complainant and respondent but also other members of the recipient's community; because of this, commenters asserted, the final regulations should specify that a school's obligation to respond following a determination of responsibility is not time-limited, and should require the school to take steps to ensure that remedial efforts are successful and to take further remedial steps if initial remedial efforts are not successful.

One commenter suggested that the Department should require recipients to make a transcript or recording of all proceedings, and that the Department should require recipients to provide the transcript or recording to the parties along with the determination regarding responsibility, at least ten days prior to any appeal deadline.

Commenters suggested that the written determination should not be prepared by the recipient but, rather, should be prepared by the Department, the U.S. Department of Justice, or a local or State human rights commission under work-sharing agreements. Commenters suggested that the same arrangement should be used to conduct the entire investigation.

Discussion: The Department believes that the written determination must include certain key elements so that the parties have a complete understanding of the process and information considered by the recipient to reach its decision and that as revised, § 106.45(b)(7)(ii) appropriately and reasonably prescribes what a determination regarding responsibility must include. Such key information includes: Identification of the allegations alleged to constitute sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30; the procedural steps taken from receipt of the formal complaint through the determination regarding responsibility; findings of fact supporting the determination; conclusions regarding the application of the recipient's code of conduct to the facts of the conduct allegedly constituting Title IX sexual harassment; a determination regarding responsibility for each allegation and the decision-maker's rationale for the result; any disciplinary sanctions the recipient imposes on the respondent and whether the recipient will provide remedies to the complainant; and information regarding the appeals process and the recipient's procedures and permissible bases for the complainant and respondent to appeal. These requirements promote transparency and consistency so that both parties have a thorough understanding of how a complainant's allegations of Title IX sexual harassment have been resolved. We believe these requirements are reasonable, and that the cost or burden associated with compliance with this provision is outweighed by the benefit of promoting a consistent, transparent Title IX grievance process, including in elementary and secondary schools, and in institutions of a smaller size.

The Department acknowledges a commenter's point that a requirement to prepare a written determination that details steps of the investigation has no equivalent within criminal or civil procedure. However, in a criminal or civil proceeding, the criminal defendant or the civil litigation parties would likely have access to the same information through a combination of discovery rules and the ability to compel witnesses to appear at trial. To avoid attempting to make educational institutions mimic courts of law, the final regulations refrain from imposing discovery rules or purporting to create subpoena powers to compel parties or witnesses to be interviewed or to testify, in a Title IX grievance process. However, the written determination detailing the steps of the recipient's investigation ensures that both parties in a Title IX grievance process understand the investigative process. This gives the parties equal opportunity to raise any procedural irregularities on appeal.[1487]

The Department disagrees with the suggestion by commenters that the Department should require the investigator's timeline to be included in the investigative report, and not in the written determination. The investigative report must fairly summarize relevant evidence, but § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) does not require that investigative report to describe the investigator's timeline. The procedural steps in the investigation will instead appear in the written determination regarding responsibility, so that both parties have a thorough understanding of the investigative process that led to the decision-maker's determination regarding responsibility.

The Department disagrees that requiring the written determination to include findings of fact supporting the determination and conclusions regarding application of the recipient's code of conduct to the facts runs contrary to the APA or otherwise exceeds the Department's regulatory authority. The Department recognizes that the Department's regulatory authority to enforce Title IX does not extend to purporting to enforce a recipient's own code of conduct. Nothing in these final regulations, including with respect to a recipient's issuance of a written determination regarding responsibility, purports to regulate a recipient's application of the recipient's own code of conduct. Instead, these final regulations, including the provisions in § 106.45(b)(7)(ii), govern how a recipient describes and explains its conclusions regarding Title IX sexual harassment in the recipient's education program or activity. The facts supporting the determination required to be included in the written determination under § 106.45(b)(7)(ii) are relevant to evaluating a recipient's response to Title IX sexual harassment regardless of the recipient's code of conduct. However, requiring the recipient to ''match up'' how the conduct that allegedly constituted Title IX sexual harassment also violates the recipient's code of conduct serves to notify the parties of any rules the recipient applies in its own code of conduct that, while not required by the § 106.45 grievance process, are permissible exercises of a recipient's discretion with respect to a Title IX grievance process. In response to commenters' concerns, we have revised § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(A) to remove reference to identification of sections of the recipient's code of conduct alleged to have been violated, and replaced that language with a requirement to identify the allegations potentially constituting sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30. Similarly, as discussed in the ''Written Notice of Allegations'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble, we have revised § 106.45(b)(2) to remove unnecessary references to the recipient's ''code of conduct'' that could have mistakenly implied that alleged conduct under investigation in a § 106.45 grievance process is conduct that violates the recipient's code of conduct without also constituting sexual harassment as defined in § 106.30. With these revisions, we do not believe that the final regulations, including 106.45(b)(7)(ii), unduly or impermissibly reference a recipient's code of conduct. Rather, this provision gives the parties information about how the conduct under investigation and adjudication (i.e., Title IX sexual harassment) fits within a recipient's own unique code of conduct so that the parties are apprised of rules unique to the recipient's own code of conduct that affect the determination or consequences of a determination regarding responsibility. For example, the final regulations include an entry for ''Consent'' under § 106.30 that assures recipients that the Department will not require recipients to adopt any particular definition of consent. Parties will benefit from a written determination that, for example, explains how the recipient's own definition of ''consent'' has been applied in a particular case to an allegation of sexual assault. Thus, the written determination requirement to include how the conduct being adjudicated fits into the recipient's code of conduct does not imply that the Department is regulating conduct outside Title IX sexual harassment.

The Department disagrees that the final regulations, or the written determination provision in particular, conflate sexual harassment with student code of conduct violations. As explained above, the written determination requirements in § 106.45(b)(7)(ii) are intended to transparently disclose to the parties how the conduct under investigation and subject to adjudication (which conduct, by virtue of § 106.45(b)(2) must consist of allegations that meet the § 106.30 definition of sexual harassment) ''matches up'' against particular portions of a recipient's code of conduct, so that the parties understand how rules unique to a recipient's code of conduct affect the determination. As to conduct that does not meet the § 106.30 definition of sexual harassment (or does not otherwise meet the jurisdictional conditions specified in § 106.44(a)), a formal complaint regarding such conduct must be dismissed for purposes of Title IX, though such conduct may be addressed by the recipient under its own code of conduct.[1488] Thus, the written determination provision in § 106.45(b)(7) only applies to Title IX sexual harassment, and does not govern a recipient's investigation or adjudication (or other response) to other misconduct under the recipient's own student conduct codes.

The Department does not believe a definition of the term ''remedies'' is necessary, but the final regulations add a statement in § 106.45(b)(1)(i) to lend clarity as to the nature of remedies. That provision now explains that remedies may include the same individualized services described in § 106.30 as ''supportive measures'' but that remedies need not be non-disciplinary or non-punitive and need not avoid burdening the respondent. Beyond this, the Department believes recipients should have the flexibility to offer such remedies as they deem appropriate to the individual facts and circumstances of each case, bearing in mind that the purpose of remedies is to restore or preserve the complainant's equal access to education.

The Department acknowledges the privacy concerns expressed by commenters regarding the inclusion of remedies in the written determination of responsibility. In response to commenters' concerns about the privacy aspects of disclosing what remedies a victim receives and the resulting possible effects of deterring reporting or making complainants feel unsafe, and in an effort to align these Title IX regulations with what recipients are required to do under the Clery Act, the final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(E) to state (emphasis added) that the written determination must include any disciplinary sanctions the recipient imposes on the respondent,[1489] ''and whether remedies will be provided by the recipient to the complainant'' to assure complainants that the nature of remedies provided [1487] Section 106.45(b)(8) (requiring recipients to offer both parties equal opportunity to appeal, on any of three bases, including that procedural irregularity affected the outcome of the matter).

[1488] Section 106.45(b)(3)(i).

[1489] We have also revised this provision to use the phrase ''disciplinary sanctions'' instead of ''sanctions'' as part of consistent use throughout the final regulations of ''disciplinary sanctions'' to avoid confusion over whether ''sanctions'' means something other than ''disciplinary sanctions.'' does not appear in the written determination, while preserving the overall fairness of giving both parties identical copies of the written determination simultaneously. The final regulations also add § 106.45(b)(7)(iv) stating that the Title IX Coordinator is responsible for the effective implementation of remedies. These revisions to § 106.45(b)(7) help ensure that complainants know that where the final determination has indicated that remedies will be provided, the complainant can then communicate separately with the Title IX Coordinator to discuss what remedies are appropriately designed to preserve or restore the complainant's equal access to education. The Department believes that these changes address commenters' concerns about the privacy implications, safety concerns, and discouragement of students and employees from participating in the process, that were raised by the proposed rules' requirement that remedies granted to a victim must be stated and described in the written determination. For discussion of these final regulations' reference to remedies and disciplinary sanctions, and FERPA, see the ''§ 106.6(e) FERPA'' subsection of the ''Clarifying Amendments to Existing Regulations'' section of this preamble.

Commenters suggested requiring assurances that the school will take steps to prevent recurrence of harassment, correct its discriminatory effects, and prevent any retaliation against the complainant because the effects of harassment can go beyond the complainant and the respondent. The Department does not believe such assurances are necessary given the recipient's ongoing and continuous duty to not be deliberatively indifferent. The Department believes the existing requirements under the final regulations are sufficient to promote prevention of recurrence of harassment and restore equal access to education. The Department believes the standard it has articulated, that a recipient's response to sexual harassment must not be clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances, sufficiently addresses further Title IX concerns for all students following a determination of responsibility. In response to concerns about retaliation, the Department has added a new section addressing the topic, § 106.71.

The Department is persuaded by the suggestion from commenters that the Department require recipients to make a transcript or recording of the live hearing. The Department believes that such a transcript is necessary to preserve the record for appeal and judicial review. This requirement is now contained in § 106.45(b)(6)(i), requiring a recipient to make an audiovisual recording, or a transcript, of any live hearing, but the Department notes that this recording or transcript is not required to be part of the written determination sent to the parties. Rather, under § 106.45(b)(6)(i) the parties have equal opportunity to inspect and review the recording or transcript of a live hearing, but that inspection and review right does not obligate the recipient to send the parties a copy of the recording or transcript.

The Department acknowledges the suggestions by commenters that the written determination should be prepared by the Department, the Department of Justice, or a local or State human rights commissions through work-sharing agreements. While the final regulations do not preclude a recipient from delegating the recipient's obligation to investigate and adjudicate formal complaints of sexual harassment to persons or entities not affiliated with the recipient (for example, under a regional center model), Title IX governs each recipient's obligation to appropriately respond to sexual harassment in the recipient's education program or activity, and the recipient remains responsible for ensuring that it responds to a formal complaint by conducting a grievance process that complies with § 106.45, including issuing a written determination.

Changes: The Department revised this provision to harmonize the language with other provisions of the final regulations. Section 106.45(b)(7) has been revised to reflect changes in § 106.45(b)(8), which now makes appeals mandatory. The proposed version of § 106.45(b)(7)(i) included language reflecting that providing for appeals was optional. Section 106.45(b)(7)(ii) uses the phrase ''disciplinary sanctions'' instead of ''sanctions.'' We have added § 106.45(b)(7)(iv) to clarify that the Title IX Coordinator is responsible for effective implementation of any remedies. This clarification reflects the mirror provision in the § 106.30 definition of ''supportive measures'' that made the Title IX Coordinator responsible for the effective implementation of supportive measures. We have also revised § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(E) to require the written determination to state whether remedies will provided to the complainant.

Section 106.45(b)(7)(iii) Timing of When the Decision Becomes Final Comments: One commenter expressed general support for § 106.45(b)(7)(iii). A few commenters expressed concerns regarding when the determination regarding responsibility becomes final and argued that the Department should permit recipients flexibility to impose sanctions on respondents upon the initial determination of responsibility and before the appeal process is complete. One commenter asserted that this approach is a best practice; appeals are meant to be limited to correcting rare error, and recipients can offer remote learning opportunities to respondents during the appeal period to preserve educational access.

One commenter argued that the proposed requirement that an appeal by either party ''stays'' the determination is also problematic because practice is not accepted in other elementary and secondary school proceedings. The commenter reasoned that a school for example, would almost never stay a school's suspension or expulsion order pending an appeal and that if a school district determines after a thorough investigation that sexual harassment occurred, school officials need to implement remedies as soon as possible in addition to continuing any interim measures already in place.

One commenter expressed concern about the possibility that nearly all respondents found in violation of a school's code of conduct will automatically appeal to OCR to have their findings overturned since such an appeal is free and can only help their position. This will significantly increase the effort and expenditures of recipients when compared with the far less expensive task of responding to an OCR data request and addressing any issues through the administrative process.

One commenter suggested that the Department clarify the meaning of ''final,'' because if ''final'' means the determination can be the basis for disciplinary measures then it could conflict with existing State timelines and appeal procedures for disciplinary decisions. One commenter expressed concern that making a ''final determination'' at the hearing could have the effect of limiting essential time to render informed decisions, thus unfairly altering the hearing process for all parties.

One commenter suggested that institutions should not be required to disclose the final outcome where doing so might upset the complainant.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the support for § 106.45(b)(7)(iii) regarding the timing of when determinations regarding responsibility become final. We acknowledge the concerns raised by some commenters regarding the effect that the timing of when a decision becomes final may have on recipients' ability to impose sanctions on respondents and remedies for complainants. The intent of this provision is to promote transparency for, and equal treatment of, the parties, and to ensure that the recipient takes action on a determination that represents a reliable, accurate outcome. Importantly, the final regulations require recipients to offer both parties an appeals process to help mitigate risks such as procedural irregularity and investigator, decision-maker, or informal resolution facilitator bias. In order to ensure that both parties have the opportunity to benefit from their right to file an appeal, the written determination becomes ''final'' only after the time period to file an appeal has expired, or if a party does file an appeal, after the appeal decision has been sent to the parties. If the written determination became final prior to the outcome of an appeal, the right to have the case heard on appeal might be undermined. We also note that the § 106.44(c) emergency removal provision gives recipients some flexibility to remove respondents to protect the physical health or safety of students or employees. The Department notes that the final regulations also require recipients to designate reasonably prompt time frames for concluding appeals and leave recipients discretion over appeal procedures; thus, the appeals process would not necessarily have to be lengthy.

The Department disagrees with commenters who argued that the proposed requirement that an appeal by either party ''stays'' the determination is problematic. The Department acknowledges that the ''judgment'' in a recipient's determination regarding responsibility is more analogous to injunctive relief than monetary damages, and that civil court rules (e.g., the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure) do not provide for automatic stay of injunctions. However, the process for concluding a recipient's appeal (thereby finalizing the determination) differs from the process for an appeal in civil court. The recipient's appeal process is likely to conclude during a much shorter time period than an appeal from a court judgment, and furthermore, the final regulations obligate the recipient to offer supportive measures throughout the grievance process (unless failing to do so would not be clearly unreasonable) thus maintaining a status quo through the grievance process that may continue a short time longer while an appeal is being resolved. The Department believes that in order for an appeal, by either party, to be fully effective, the recipient must wait to act on the determination regarding responsibility while maintaining the status quo between the parties through supportive measures designed to ensure equal access to education. Because a recipient's determination regarding responsibility in the nature of injunctive relief, if the recipient acts on a determination prior to resolving any appeal against that determination, the recipient likely will have taken steps requiring the parties to change their positions, in ways that cannot be easily reversed if the determination is changed due to the appeal. On the other hand, maintaining the status quo a short time while an appeal is resolved gives the parties, and the recipient, confidence that the determination regarding responsibility acted upon represents a factually accurate, reliable outcome.

The Department disagrees that all respondents will file an ''appeal'' with OCR, or that the rate at which respondents file complaints with OCR challenging the recipient's response to a formal complaint of sexual harassment will interfere with victims' abilities to receive remedies under a promptly-resolved grievance process. Any person, including any complainant or respondent, may file a complaint with OCR claiming that a recipient has not complied with the recipient's obligations under Title IX. However, filing a complaint with OCR does not ''stay'' or reverse the recipient's determination regarding responsibility. Moreover, the final regulations include § 106.44(b)(2) which gives deference to the recipient's determination regarding responsibility by assuring recipients that the Department will not deem a recipient's determination regarding responsibility to be evidence of deliberate indifference by the recipient, or otherwise evidence of discrimination under Title IX by the recipient, solely because the Assistant Secretary would have reached a different determination based on an independent weighing of the evidence. Thus, after a party (whether respondent or complainant) has taken advantage of the recipient's own appeal process, the Department believes it is unlikely that parties will rush to file with OCR, first because the recipient's appeal process will address procedural, new evidence, and bias or conflict of interest problems that affected the outcome, and second because the final regulations clarify for all parties that the Department will not reverse an outcome based solely on re-weighing the evidence.

We appreciate the opportunity to address commenters' questions regarding the meaning of a ''final'' determination. A ''final'' determination means the written determination containing the information required in § 106.45(b)(7), as modified by any appeal by the parties. With respect to potential conflict with State procedures, under the final regulations recipients have substantial discretion to designate time frames for concluding the grievance process, including appeals, thus lessening the likelihood that a recipient must violate a State law with respect to timely conclusion of a grievance process. In the event of actual conflict, our position is that the final regulations would have preemptive effect.[1490] Further, the Department appreciates the opportunity to clarify here that nothing in the final regulations requires final determinations to be made at the hearing; the commenter who expressed concern over this possibility appears to have misinterpreted the NPRM, as the proposed regulations did not provide for that outcome. Rather, the final regulations provide that a determination regarding responsibility cannot be reached without conducting a live hearing (for postsecondary institutions), or without first giving the parties an opportunity to submit written questions to parties and witnesses (for elementary and secondary schools, and other recipients who are not postsecondary institutions), and § 106.45(b)(7)(ii) states that the decision-maker ''must issue a written determination regarding responsibility'' but does not require that written determination to be issued at the hearing. The Department notes that the time frame for when the decision-maker should issue the written determination will be governed by the recipient's designated, reasonably prompt time frames under § 106.45(b)(1)(v).

The Department wishes to make clear that it is certainly not our intent to upset or traumatize complainants by requiring recipients to provide a written determination regarding responsibility to both complainants and respondents. To promote transparency, equal treatment of the parties, and to ensure that both parties' right to appeal may be meaningfully exercised, the final regulations require the decision-maker to simultaneously send a copy of the written determination to both parties. In response to commenters' concerns that including details about remedies for complainants in the written determination could pose unnecessary privacy, confidentiality, or safety problems that could negatively impact complainants, the final regulations revise this provision to require that the written determination state whether remedies will be provided to a complainant; the nature of such remedies can then be discussed separately between the complainant and the Title IX Coordinator. The final regulations also add § 106.45(b)(7)(iv) to state that the Title IX Coordinator is responsible for the effective implementation of remedies.

Changes: We have revised § 106.45(b)(7)(iii) such that responsibility determinations will become final either on the date the recipient simultaneously provides the written determination of the appeal result to the parties, or the date on which an appeal is no longer timely if neither party appeals. We have revised § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(E) to state that while the written determination must include ''any sanctions the recipient imposes on the respondent,'' the written determination must only state ''whether remedies designed to restore or preserve equal access to the recipient's education program or activity will be provided by the recipient to the complainant.'' (Emphasis added.) We also add § 106.45(b)(7)(iv) to state that the Title IX Coordinator is responsible for the effective implementation of remedies.

[§ 106.45(b)(7)(iv) Title IX Coordinator Responsible for Effective Implementation of Remedies: Addressed Under § 106.45(b)(7)(iii)]

Transcript Notations

Comments: Some commenters expressed concern about harms to the education, career, well-being, and lives of students whose transcripts are marked as responsible for sexual misconduct. Several commenters referenced the notation as a ''black mark'' on a student's record and asserted that it is overly stigmatizing or punitive, and imposes permanent barriers to success in one's education and career. One commenter, for example, noted the damage of respondents having to disclose such records to apply to graduate school, to receive a professional license, or to potential employers, which risks being denied admission, disciplined, or suspended from one's professional practice, as well as a stain on one's personal relationships and reputation. Several commenters emphasized their concerns about such transcript notations being imposed without due process protections or using a low standard of evidence. Another commenter asserted that the records have no predictive value, would not prevent crimes even if shared, are often inaccurate or misleading (such as recording both an unwanted touch and rape as sexual misconduct), and create a high financial burden to clearing one's name through litigation that only well-off families can afford. Similarly, another commenter asserted that expunging disciplinary records would significantly improve the lives of respondents while imposing minimal costs or administrative burdens on schools.

A number of commenters suggested mechanisms be added to the final regulations for removing sexual misconduct notations or for expunging such records so that the students involved could clear their names and reputations. Several commenters suggested expunging records after a certain time period, such as after a sanction has been served or after a certain number of years. Other commenters suggested limiting expungement to less egregious cases, such as in cases: Not involving rape; with no criminal charges or findings; or for lower-level, noncriminal, or non-violent cases not involving weapons, evidence of force, incapacitation, multiple parties, or multiple witnesses. Several commenters suggested allowing schools to expunge records of students found responsible under withdrawn or disapproved OCR policies, which commenters stated could be accomplished if the Department would express to recipients that the Department will not penalize a recipient that chooses to re-open and reconsider closed cases.

One commenter suggested deeming a school in violation of Title IX for not removing a notation based on flawed prior proceedings or for refusing to provide continuing enrollment at an institution if a student does not proceed with a Title IX investigation and hearing that lacks fundamental safeguards; this commenter asserted that schools have used flawed procedures as a result of the Department's withdrawn 2011 Dear Colleague Letter. Another commenter proposed allowing transcript notations only in the most egregious cases and that used a clear and convincing evidence standard, allowed cross-examination, and gave the accused a chance to help select the trier of fact.

Some commenters provided other points of view. A few expressed concerns that individuals found responsible for sexual misconduct could transfer to other educational institutions that have no awareness of such misconduct. One such commenter proposed mandating that Title IX findings be shared between universities to help them avoid hiring sexual harassers. Another commenter, a State's attorney general, urged the Department not to restrict schools from being more aggressive in addressing sexual harassment, citing their State law requiring transcript notations for respondents who are suspended, dismissed, or who withdraw while under investigation for sexual assault.

Discussion: The Department understands the concerns that commenters raise about transcript notations, the value of these transcript notations, and the impact that these transcript notations may have on a respondent's future educational and career opportunities. The Department also appreciates the concerns of other commenters that individuals found responsible for sexual misconduct could transfer to other educational institutions that have no awareness of such misconduct. The Department intentionally did not take a position in the NPRM on transcript notations or the range of possible sanctions for a respondent who is found responsible for sexual harassment. The Department does not wish to dictate to recipients the sanctions that should be imposed when a respondent is found responsible for sexual harassment as each formal complaint of sexual harassment presents unique facts and circumstances. As previously stated, the Department believes that teachers and local school leaders with unique knowledge of the school climate and student body, are best positioned to make disciplinary decisions. If a respondent determines that a school is discriminating against the respondent based on sex with respect to a sanction such as a transcript notation, then a respondent may be able to challenge such a discriminatory practice through a recipient's procedures under § 106.8(c) or through filing a complaint with OCR.

We do not wish to deem a school in violation for a school's conduct prior to the effective date of these final regulations, including conduct such as not removing a notation based on a prior proceeding that lacked due process or a school's past refusal to provide continuing enrollment at a postsecondary institution if a student does not proceed with a Title IX investigation and hearing that lacks fundamental safeguards. These final regulations will apply prospectively to give recipients adequate notice of the standards that apply to them. The Department shares some of the concerns that the commenter has about the 2011 Dear Colleague Letter, and the Department has withdrawn the 2011 Dear Colleague Letter.[1491]

The Department understands the commenter's concerns that respondents who have been found responsible for sexual harassment may transfer to another institution or be hired by another institution and declines to require that institutions share the result of a Title IX investigation or proceeding with other institutions. Requiring such disclosure of personally identifiable information from a student's education record outside the elementary or secondary school or postsecondary institution may require institutions to violate FERPA, and its implementing regulations. These final regulations are consistent with FERPA, and the Department does not wish to impose any requirements that violate FERPA.

As at least one commenter stated, some States have adopted laws concerning transcript notations in the context of sexual harassment, and the Department's approach does not present any conflict with these State laws. The Department's policy aligns with the holding of the Supreme Court in Davis that courts must not second guess recipients' disciplinary decisions.[1492] Where a respondent has been found responsible for sexual harassment, any disciplinary sanction decision rests within the discretion of the recipient, although the recipient must also provide remedies, as appropriate, to the complainant designed to restore or preserve the complainant's equal educational access.[1493]

The Department also appreciates the concern that transcript notations may be imposed without adequate due process protections or a low standard of evidence. In response to these concerns, the Department revised § 106.44(a) to provide that an equitable response for a respondent means a grievance process that complies with § 106.45 before the imposition of any disciplinary sanctions or other actions that are not supportive measures, as defined in § 106.30. Although the Department will not interfere with the recipient's discretion in imposing an appropriate sanction, the Department requires that a respondent receive a grievance process with the fulsome due process protections in § 106.45 before any sanctions are imposed. Accordingly, a recipient will be held in violation of these regulations for failing to proceed with a Title IX investigation and hearing that lacks fundamental safeguards. These final regulations provide that a recipient may use either a preponderance of the evidence standard or a clear and convincing evidence standard and must apply the same standard of evidence for complaints against students as it does for complaints against employees, including faculty.[1494] If a recipient chooses to use a preponderance of the evidence standard, then the recipient must carefully consider whether the sanction of a transcript notation is appropriate under Federal case law. As noted in § 106.6(d)(2), nothing in these final regulations deprives a person of any rights that would otherwise be protected from government action under the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments of the U.S. Constitution.

The Department also appreciates the comments regarding the expungement of records. The Department did not address expungement in its proposed regulations and declines to do so here. The concept of expungement in the context of an education program or activity appears novel. A recipient may choose to have an expungement process that removes a sanction or result of a hearing or appeal from a respondent's official academic or disciplinary record at the school or institution if a respondent is found not responsible after a hearing or an appeal. A recipient, however, must retain certain records of a sexual harassment investigation for at least seven years under § 106.45(b)(10), even if the recipient has a process for expungement. As explained earlier in this preamble, this seven-year period aligns with the record retention period in the Department's regulations,[1495] which is important as the definitions for sexual assault, dating violence, domestic violence, and stalking from the regulations implementing the Clery Act are part of the definition of sexual harassment in § 106.30. The Department will not dictate how recipients must treat these records after seven years because recipients may have other obligations that require them to preserve the records for a longer period of time such as the obligation to preserve records for litigation. Recipients, however, may choose to destroy records after this seven-year retention period. The Department notes that these final regulations, including the seven-year retention period, apply prospectively only.

Just as the Department is not dictating when and whether a recipient may destroy records after the seven-year retention period, the Department will not dictate when and whether recipients may destroy records of respondents found responsible for sexual harassment before these final regulations become effective. As long as recipients adhere to all other Federal retention requirements that the Department imposes, the Department will not interfere with a recipient's decision to expunge records of responsibility determinations made under prior OCR policies, irrespective of whether these policies were rescinded. Recipients, however, should be mindful of adhering to any retention requirements in State law and in their own policies. Recipients also must not treat or categorize records in a manner that results in discrimination based on sex under the Department's regulations. In other words, a recipient cannot treat people differently on the basis of their sex with respect to records pertaining to sexual harassment.

Changes: The Department revised § 106.44(a) to provide that an equitable response for a respondent means a grievance process that complies with § 106.45 before the imposition of any disciplinary sanctions or other actions that are not supportive measures, as defined in § 106.30.

Appeals

Section 106.45(b)(8) Appeals

Comments: A number of commenters supported equal appeal rights for both complainants and respondents because they believe it will bring campus procedures in line with the requirements of due process, First Amendment free speech rights, established case law, and existing legislation. Commenters also argued that equal appeal rights will reduce litigation by reducing the abuses of Title IX procedures and helping to ensure accuracy. Some commenters argued that the proposed regulations promote fairness and push back on misguided efforts to micromanage the lives of students. Commenters stated that many institutions may not be equipped to decide whether to offer an appeal, or that institutions may have a conflict of interest, and that the proposed regulations balance the complexities of the modern education environment. Some commenters shared personal stories about how they have benefitted from attending institutions that offered appeal rights or, conversely, about how costly it was to overturn a denial of due process at institutions that did not offer appeal rights. Some commenters supported the NPRM because denying appeal rights to complainants would cause further trauma, while offering them the option to appeal will provide needed support. Other commenters argued that the NPRM promotes fair and impartial procedures that will protect justice and civil rights. Commenters supported giving both parties the opportunity to submit a written statement supporting or challenging the outcome.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the general support received from commenters regarding our approach to offering appeal rights to both parties in Title IX proceedings, and the urging of many commenters to require recipients to offer appeals. The Department is persuaded by commenters that recipient-level appeals should be mandatory and offered equally to both parties because this will make it more likely that recipients reach sound determinations, giving the parties greater confidence in the ultimate outcome. Complainants and respondents have different interests in the outcome of a sexual harassment complaint. Complainants ''have a right, and are entitled to expect, that they may attend [school] without fear of sexual assault or harassment,'' while for respondents a ''finding of responsibility for a sexual offense can have a lasting impact on a student's personal life, in addition to [the student's] educational and employment opportunities[.]'' [1496] Although these interests may differ, each represents high-stakes, potentially life-altering consequences deserving of an accurate outcome.[1497] Accordingly, the Department has revised § 106.45(b)(8) to require recipients to offer both parties equal appeal rights on three bases: procedural irregularity, newly discovered evidence, and bias or conflict of interest. This provision further states that recipients may offer appeals on additional grounds but must do so equally for both parties. The revised provision also expressly permits both parties to appeal a recipient's dismissal of a formal complaint (or allegations therein), whether the dismissal was mandatory or discretionary under § 106.45(b)(3). We have also removed the limitation that precluded a complainant from appealing the severity of sanctions; the final regulations leave to a recipient's discretion whether severity or proportionality of sanctions is an appropriate basis for appeal, but any such appeal offered by a recipient must be offered equally to both parties.

Changes: We have revised § 106.45(b)(8) such that recipients must offer both parties an appeal from determinations regarding responsibility, or from a recipient's dismissal of a formal complaint or any allegations contained in a formal complaint. Recipients must offer appeals on at least the three following bases: (1) Procedural irregularity that affected the outcome; (2) new evidence that was not reasonably available when the determination of responsibility was made that could affect the outcome; or (3) the Title IX Coordinator, investigator, or decision-maker had a general or specific conflict of interest or bias against the complainant or respondent that affected the outcome. Recipients may offer appeals equally to both parties on additional bases. Complainants and respondents have equal appeal rights under the final regulations; we have removed the NPRM's limitation on complainants' right to appeal sanctions.

Comments: Some commenters argued that the proposed regulations do not reflect the high ideals we should have for education. Other commenters expressed concern about the application of § 106.45(b)(8), arguing that appeals procedures will not be applied equally across the country and that appeals should be made mandatory instead. Other commenters suggested that appeals should only be granted when parties can demonstrate specific rights that were violated by the proceedings. Other commenters suggested adding greater due process protections, such as barring appeals of any not guilty finding, in accordance with the double-jeopardy principle enshrined in the Constitution and applied in criminal proceedings. Commenters opposed § 106.45(b)(8) because many institutions already offer equal appeals to both parties.

Discussion: The Department is persuaded by commenters who asserted that appeal rights should be mandatory for Title IX proceedings. We have revised § 106.45(b)(8) to require recipients to offer both parties the opportunity to appeal a determination regarding responsibility on any of three bases, and equal opportunity to appeal a recipient's decision to dismiss a formal complaint or an allegation contained in a formal complaint.[1498] This will help to ensure that appeal rights are applied equally by recipients across the country, increasing the legitimacy of recipients' determinations regarding responsibility and ensuring that recipients have an opportunity to self-correct erroneous outcomes. The final regulations clearly specify which rights or interests could justify an opportunity to appeal; namely, where the outcome was affected by procedural irregularity, newly discovered evidence, or conflict of interest or bias in key personnel involved with the investigation and adjudication of the case. The Department also believes that giving recipients flexibility and discretion in crafting their Title IX processes is important, and we believe that recipients are in best position to know the unique values and interests of their educational communities. For this reason, § 106.45(b)(8) grants recipients discretion to offer appeals on additional grounds, so long as such additional bases for appeal are offered equally to both parties.

We respectfully disagree with the commenters who argued that the final regulations should prohibit appeals of not responsible determinations because of double jeopardy concerns. As discussed above, we believe that both respondents and complainants face potentially life-altering consequences from the outcomes of Title IX proceedings. As such, it is important to protect complainants' right to appeal as well as respondents' right to appeal. We believe the final regulations adequately protect both parties' interests in a fair, accurate outcome by requiring recipients to offer both parties the opportunity to appeal on at least three specific bases; requiring that appeal decision-makers be different than the Title IX Coordinator, investigator(s), or decision-maker(s) that reached the initial determination; requiring appeal decision-makers to satisfy the robust anti-bias and training requirements of § 106.45(b)(1)(iii); giving both parties a meaningful and equal opportunity to submit written statements supporting or challenging the outcome; and requiring written determinations explaining the appeal result and rationales to be given to both parties.

Comments: Some commenters expressed concern that § 106.45(b)(8) was not drafted with the victim in mind. Commenters opposed restricting the complainant's right to appeal because equal appeal rights are supported by experts, or because the complainant may have new evidence and restricting their appeal rights will put the integrity of the proceeding at risk. Commenters argued that appeals for only the respondent are not needed because false accusations are rare. These commenters also believed that approach proposed in the NPRM offers unequal appeal rights, which reinforces sex stereotypes, can be a form of sex bias, and can signal that sexual harassment is not treated seriously.

Some commenters opposed restricting the complainant's right to appeal because the Secretary spoke in favor of equal appeals. Other commenters argued that appeals are a guaranteed right for any individual who is participating in a federally-funded program and that complainants should not be restricted at all in their grounds for appeals. Commenters argued that a school's grievance procedure should be compared to an administrative process rather than a criminal process, and that appeals ensure an additional layer of review that is needed when fact-finders may not be sympathetic to claims that access to educational opportunities has been impaired. Some commenters expressed concern that the proposed appeal procedures would disrupt the balance of rights in campus procedures and, by treating sexual harassment uniquely, will cause sexual harassment claims to be received with skepticism.

Discussion: The Department has revised many provisions of the final regulations with the well-being of victims in mind, including revisions to § 106.45(b)(8) that require recipients to offer appeals equally to both parties and remove the restriction in the NPRM on complainants' ability to appeal a determination based on the severity of the sanctions imposed on the respondent. The Department is persuaded by many commenters' concerns that the right to appeals should be mandatory and equally available to both parties. We have revised § 106.45(b)(8) to provide equal appeal rights to both parties and include robust protections such as anti-bias and training requirements for appeal decision-makers, strict separation of the appeal decision-makers from the individuals who investigated and adjudicated the underlying case to reinforce independence and neutrality, and retain the proposed provision's requirements allowing both parties equal opportunity to participate in the appeals process through submitting written statements, and requiring reasoned written decisions describing the appeal results to be provided to both parties. Under the final regulations, the appeal rights of complainants and respondents are identical. Appeals may be an important mechanism to reduce the possibility of unfairness or to correct potential errors made in the initial responsibility determination.

As a general principle, we agree with commenters that one of the goals of these regulations should be to preserve recipients' autonomy to craft procedures by which they address issues of sexual misconduct. However, the Department also believes that the requirements contained in the final regulations, including § 106.45(b)(8) on appeals, further the twin purposes of the Title IX statute. As the Supreme Court has stated, the objectives of Title IX are two-fold: first, to ''avoid the use of Federal resources to support discriminatory practices'' and second, to ''provide individual citizens effective protection against those practices'' [1499] The Department is persuaded by commenters who urged that recipient-level appeals are not only a best practice, but should be required equally for both parties, to provide additional, effective protections against a recipient reaching an unjust or inaccurate outcome in Title IX sexual harassment proceedings.

Changes: None.

Comments: Some commenters argued that granting the complainant a right to appeal will adversely affect the proceedings by empowering institutions to be advocates for complainants. Commenters asserted that institutions can offer supportive measures to complainants such that the benefits to the complainant of being able to appeal a finding of non-responsibility are not sufficient to outweigh the respondent's interest in not having to face the same accusation more than once. Commenters also argued that the Department has not offered enough guidance on how institutions can offer complainants appeals while preserving the presumption of innocence.

Discussion: We believe that granting appeal rights to complainants will not have the effect of turning recipients into advocates for complainants, and granting those same appeal rights to respondents does not turn recipients into advocates for respondents, either. The Department wishes to emphasize that supportive measures, such as mutual no-contact orders or academic course adjustments, remain available to help restore or preserve either party's equal access to education and that such measures may continue in place throughout an appeal process.[1500] We believe that maintaining a level of equal educational access while the recipient takes an additional step (assuming one or both parties decide to appeal) contributes to the benefit of requiring equal appeal rights, so that recipients may self-correct erroneous outcomes, better ensuring that the § 106.45 grievance process as a whole leads to reliable determinations regarding responsibility. As a result, we have revised § 106.45(b)(8) to require recipients to offer both parties equal appeal rights on bases of procedural irregularity, newly discovered evidence, or bias or conflict of interest; if such grounds exist, a party should be able to appeal and ask the recipient to revisit the outcome so that the recipient has the opportunity to correct the outcome, whether such an improvement in the accuracy of the outcome is for the complainant's benefit or the respondent's benefit. The Department notes that under the final regulations, whether the parties can appeal based solely on the severity of sanctions is left to the recipient's discretion, though if the recipient allows appeals on that basis, both parties must have equal opportunity to appeal on that basis.

The Department does not believe that this approach to appeals constitutes double jeopardy unfair to respondents; the Department reiterates that the Title IX grievance process differs in purpose and procedure from a criminal proceeding, and the Department is not persuaded that a fair process under Title IX requires protection against ''double jeopardy'' the way that the U.S. Constitution grants such protection to criminal defendants. The Department acknowledges that respondents face a burden if a complainant appeals a determination of non-responsibility, but the Department believes it is important for recipients to revisit determinations that were reached via alleged procedural irregularity or bias or conflict of interest affecting the outcome, or where newly discovered evidence may affect the outcome. The Department notes that § 106.45(b)(1)(v) requires recipients to conclude the appeal process under designated, reasonably prompt time frames, and thus the end result is that [1500] We reiterate that as to complainants, revised § 106.44(a) requires recipients to offer supportive measures to complainants, and the definition of supportive measures in § 106.30 states that supportive measures may be available for either party.

the recipient's final determination in a Title IX grievance process is both accurate and reasonably prompt.

With respect to commenters' request that the Department offer additional guidance on how recipients may offer appeals to complainants while also respecting the presumption of non-responsibility contained in § 106.45(b)(1)(iv), we believe that nothing about § 106.45(b)(1)(iv), or the underlying principles justifying the presumption of non-responsibility, conflicts with the equal appeal rights that § 106.45(b)(8) of the final regulations offers to both complainants and respondents. As discussed in the ''Section 106.45(b)(1)(iv) Presumption of Non-Responsibility'' subsection of the ''General Requirements for § Grievance Process'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble, the presumption of non-responsibility is intended to ensure that recipients do not treat respondents as responsible prior to ultimate resolution of the grievance process. For the reasons discussed above, asking recipients to offer appeals where the outcome may have been affected by procedural irregularity, bias or conflict of interest, or where newly discovered evidence becomes available helps ensure that the final determination in each particular case is factually accurate, because a proceeding infected by such defects may have resulted in an erroneous outcome to the prejudice of the complainant or the respondent.

Changes: None.

Comments: Some commenters argued that unequal appeal rights will have an adverse effect on campus safety. Commenters cited the high rates of sexual assault and harassment and expressed fear about attending campus if these regulations take effect. Commenters expressed concern that victims will experience further trauma and not be able to receive an education if recipients cannot punish their attacker.

Discussion: In response to commenters' concerns that any inequality in the appeals provision could undermine the safety and security of recipients' educational communities, the Department has revised § 106.45(b)(8) to require recipients to offer appeals to both complainants and respondents on three specified bases, and if a recipient chooses to offer appeals on additional bases such appeals also must be offered equally to both parties. As discussed above, the Department believes that by offering the opportunity to appeal to both parties, recipients will be more likely to reach sound determinations, giving the parties greater confidence in the ultimate outcome and better ensuring that recipients appropriately respond to sexual harassment for the benefit of all students and employees in recipients' education programs and activities.

Changes: None.

Comments: Some commenters argued that the NPRM's appeal provisions conflicted with Federal law, including the Campus SAVE Act, because as proposed, § 106.45(b)(8) gave unequal appeal rights to the parties. Commenters also asserted that the Department mischaracterized case law in the NPRM's preamble to purportedly justify imposing unequal appeal rights on the parties. Some commenters contended the NPRM's appeal provisions conflicted with OCR's past enforcement practices.

Discussion: In response to well-taken arguments made by commenters, the Department is persuaded that the final regulations, unlike the NPRM, should require recipients to give equal appeal rights to the parties. That is why, as discussed above, the limitation contained in the NPRM that complainants could not appeal sanction decisions has been removed from the final regulations. We are leaving recipients with the discretion to permit both parties to appeal sanctions, provided that such an appeal must be offered equally to both parties. We therefore decline to address the contention raised by some commenters that the approach to appeal rights contained in the NPRM may have conflicted with Federal law such as the Campus SAVE Act, or with past Department enforcement practices.

The Department believes that by offering appeals to both complainants and respondents on an equal basis, recipients will be more likely to reach sound determinations, giving the parties greater confidence in the ultimate outcome. Both complainants and respondents have significant interests in the outcomes of these proceedings; the consequences of a particular determination of responsibility or sanction can be life-altering for both parties and thus each determination must be factually accurate. The stakes are simply too high in the context of sexual misconduct for appeals not to be part of the grievance process; as many commenters pointed out, a recipient-level appeal gives the recipient an opportunity to ensure factual accuracy in determinations by permitting either party to bring to the recipient's attention improper factors that affected the initial determination. The Department is persuaded by commenters who urged the Department to recognize that an error or bias affecting the initial determination regarding responsibility is as likely to negatively affect a complainant as a respondent, and thus the equality of both parties' right to appeal is critical to the parties' sense of justice and confidence in the outcome. Furthermore, a procedural irregularity that affected the outcome, newly discovered evidence that may have affected the outcome, or bias or conflict of interest that affected the outcome, each represents an error that, if left uncorrected by the recipient, indicates that the determination was inaccurate, and thus that sexual harassment in the recipient's education program or activity has not been identified and appropriately addressed. Appeals enable recipients to correct errors in the adjudicative process, and may also reduce parties' reliance on OCR or private litigation to challenge the outcomes thereby yielding just outcomes more quickly than when a party must seek justice in a process outside the recipient's own Title IX grievance process. The Department has therefore revised § 106.45(b)(8) to ensure that both parties have equal right to appeal by asking recipients to reconsider determinations (using a different decision-maker from any person who served as the Title IX Coordinator, investigator, or decision-maker reaching the initial determination) where procedural irregularity, newly discovered evidence, or bias or conflict of interest affected the outcome.

The same reasoning applies to a recipient's dismissal of a formal complaint, or allegations therein; where a recipient's dismissal is in error (for example, the recipient incorrectly decided that the underlying alleged incident did not occur in the recipient's education program or activity leading to mandatory dismissal for Title IX purposes, or the recipient's discretionary dismissal was based on incorrect facts), the parties should have the opportunity to challenge the recipient's dismissal decision so that the recipient may correct the error and avoid inaccurately dismissing a formal complaint that needs to be resolved in order to identify and remedy Title IX sexual harassment. Thus, we have also revised this provision to expressly allow both parties the equal right to appeal a recipient's mandatory or discretionary dismissals under § 106.45(b)(3)(i)–(ii).

Changes: None.

Comments: Some commenters opposed restricting complainants' rights to appeal because of the effect this provision would have on sanctions issued during the grievance process. Commenters argued that respondents are often given light sanctions and are permitted to remain at the institution, adversely impacting complainants' access to education. They contended that it is unfair to allow one party to appeal sanctions, but not the other party. Commenters asserted that complainants should have a say in the sanctions delivered to the respondents. Other commenters argued that complainants should be allowed to appeal sanctions because they will have a strong interest in doing so, while respondents should not be allowed to appeal sanctions because they would only do so out of self-interest.

Discussion: As discussed above, and in response to well-taken concerns raised by commenters, the Department has decided to remove the limitation contained in the NPRM that would have prevented complainants from appealing recipients' sanction decisions. Under § 106.45(b)(8) of the final regulations, recipients have the discretion to permit parties to appeal sanctions. The Department wishes to clarify that if recipients decide to offer appeal rights regarding sanctions, then both complainants and respondents must have the same rights to appeal. We agree with commenters that it would be unfair and run counter to the spirit of Title IX to permit complainants to appeal sanction decisions but not permit respondents to appeal sanction decisions, and vice versa, and as such if a recipient allows appeals on the basis of severity of sanctions that appeal must be offered equally to both parties.

Changes: None.

Comments: Some commenters argued that the Department should require institutions to offer appeals. They argued that mandated appeals will ensure uniformity, reduce litigation, and will be necessary due to the decreased standard of liability. Other commenters expressed concern that offering complainants the right to appeal would violate due process. They argued that a false finding of responsibility will result in life-altering stigma and harm to respondents and that their interest in avoiding double jeopardy is significant. Some commenters suggested that if respondents are allowed to appeal, they should only be allowed to appeal for blatant errors. Some commenters argued that § 106.45(b)(8) was not clear that an appeals panel must be different from the original panel. Commenters suggested that the Department ensure a third-party appeals process to protect the fairness and independence of the decisions on appeal.

Discussion: The Department is persuaded by the concerns raised by commenters, and we note that § 106.45(b)(8) of the final regulations requires recipients to offer appeals equally to both parties. Further, we acknowledge that being found responsible for sexual misconduct under Title IX may carry a significant social stigma and life-altering consequences that could impact the respondent's future educational and economic opportunities. However, we also believe that complainants have significant, life-altering interests at stake, and that they ''have a right, and are entitled to expect, that they may attend [school] without fear of sexual assault or harassment.'' [1501] For these reasons, along with the centrality of appeals as a mechanism for addressing potential unfairness or error in an adjudication, the Department believes that appeal rights should be offered equally to both complainants and respondents in recipients' Title IX proceedings. Further, we believe that appeal rights for respondents should not be limited to ''blatant errors,'' as suggested by one commenter. Instead, the final regulations specify the bases upon which either party can appeal, including procedural irregularity or bias or conflict of interest in key personnel involved in the adjudicative process that affected the outcome, or newly discovered evidence that would affect the outcome. Moreover, we recognize the importance of granting recipients flexibility and discretion in designing and implementing their Title IX systems; the Department believes recipients are in best position to know the unique needs and values of their educational communities. For this reason, § 106.45(b)(8) permits recipients to offer appeals to both parties on additional bases in their discretion.

With respect to ensuring that appeal decision-makers are different individuals than investigators, Title IX Coordinators, or decision-makers who rendered the initial determination regarding responsibility, the Department agrees with commenters and therefore, § 106.45(b)(8)(iii) makes it clear that the appeal decision-maker cannot be the same person as the decision-maker below, or as the Title IX Coordinator or investigator in the case. This ensures that the recipient's appeal decision reviews the underlying case independently. The Department also notes that appeal decision-makers must be free from bias and conflicts of interest, and be trained to serve impartially, as required under § 106.45(b)(1)(iii).

We respectfully disagree with the commenters who argued that the final regulations should prohibit appeals of not responsible determinations because of double jeopardy concerns. As discussed above, we believe that both respondents and complainants face potentially life-altering consequences from the outcomes of Title IX proceedings. As such, it is important to protect complainants' right to appeal as well as respondents' right to appeal.

The Department does not believe that a third party independent from the recipient would need to handle appeals to ensure impartiality and fairness. Rather, the robust anti-bias and training requirements of § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) that apply to appeal decision-makers, along with the requirement contained in § 106.45(b)(8)(iii) that the appeal decision-maker must be a different person than the Title IX Coordinator or any investigators or decision-makers that reached the initial determination of responsibility, will help to ensure that recipients' appeal processes are adequately independent and effective in curing possible unfairness or error.

Changes: None.

Informal Resolution

Section 106.45(b)(9) Informal Resolution

Supporting and Expanding Informal Resolution

Comments: Some commenters appreciated the option of informal resolution in the proposed rules for reasons that echoed one commenter's assertions as follows: ''Restrictions on informal resolution have had several problematic consequences. Would-be complainants often declined to come forward with complaints because they were offered only two roads forward: The full formal process leading to possibly severe punishment for the respondent, or counseling for themselves. These students often said: 'I don't want the respondent to be punished; I just want them to realize how bad this event was for me.' Students fully prepared to confess, apologize, and take their sanction were sometimes ground through the formal process for no good reason. Additionally, often both parties would have preferred informal resolution; a rule that pushed them to adopt an adversarial posture vis a vis each other meant that the conflict persisted, and even escalated, when it could have been settled.''

A number of commenters urged the Department to make informal resolution the default option for addressing sexual misconduct. One commenter emphasized that sometimes alleged victims just want to be heard, that confidential settlement conferences should be required before any formal hearing process, and the final regulations should prohibit any settlement mediator from being called as a witness in subsequent proceedings. Another commenter argued that where the default option of mediation fails, the parties should then turn to the court system. One commenter suggested the Department place informal resolution near the start of the final regulations to encourage its use. Several commenters noted that informal resolution can empower victims and increase flexibility to address unique situations; they argued that informal resolution increases choice by allowing both parties to choose the option that is right for them and that the Department should not arbitrarily force them into a formal process. Commenters asserted that confidential conversations between the parties can be ideal where there is insufficient evidence to warrant investigation, or where there may be confusion or misunderstanding as to what exactly happened between the parties. One commenter asserted that it is inaccurate to call mediation ''forced'' or ''unregulated'' because the NPRM imposes important requirements on recipients' use of informal resolution and recipients remain free to prohibit it. A few commenters contended that informal resolution is more efficient than formal proceedings because it is faster and less costly and parties do not need to hire expensive attorneys.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the support from commenters regarding informal resolution and agrees that, subject to limitations, informal resolution may represent a beneficial outcome for both parties superior to forcing the parties to complete a formal investigation and adjudication process as the only option once a formal complaint has raised allegations of sexual harassment. As discussed below, the Department has made several changes to the informal resolution provision in the final regulations to better address potential risks while retaining the benefits that such an option may hold for parties in particular cases.

As a general matter, informal or alternative dispute resolution processes have become increasingly available throughout the American legal system, in recognition of a variety of potential benefits (such as shortening the time frames governing litigation, greater party control over outcomes which may improve parties' sense of justice and increase compliance with outcomes, and yielding remedies more customized to the needs of unique situations) of alternative dispute resolution as a substitute for the adversarial process.[1502] Alternative dispute resolution presents the same potential benefits for sexual harassment cases as for other disputes.[1503]

We acknowledge the suggestions made by some commenters that the Department go further to promote informal resolution as a means of addressing sexual misconduct under Title IX, such as by making informal resolution a default option or placing the informal resolution provisions near the start of the final regulations. As recognized by many commenters, the Department believes that informal resolution may empower complainants and respondents to address alleged sexual misconduct incidents through a process that is most appropriate for them, and that it is inaccurate to call informal resolution mechanisms such as mediation ''forced'' or ''unregulated.'' Informal resolution also enhances recipient and party autonomy and flexibility to address unique situations. However, the Department also believes that the more formal grievance process under § 106.45 may be an appropriate mechanism to address sexual misconduct under Title IX in many circumstances because these provisions establish procedural safeguards providing a fair process for all parties, where disputed factual allegations must be resolved. Furthermore, the existence of a formal grievance process provides parties (where a recipient has chosen to offer informal resolution processes) with expanded choice in the form of alternatives that will best meet the needs of parties involved in a particular situation; the Department does not believe that requiring informal resolution to be attempted prior to engaging the formal grievance process results in the parties having genuine choice and control over the process. Because informal resolution, as opposed to formal investigation and adjudication, relies on the voluntary participation of both parties, the Department declines to require or allow informal resolution processes to be a ''default.'' The ''default'' is that a formal complaint must be investigated and adjudicated by the recipient; within the parameters of § 106.45(b)(9) a recipient may choose to offer the parties an informal process that resolves the formal complaint without completing the investigation and adjudication, but such a result depends on whether the recipient determines that informal resolution may be appropriate and whether both parties voluntarily agree to attempt informal resolution. To clarify the intent of this provision, we have revised § 106.45(b)(9) to state that recipients may not offer informal resolution unless a formal complaint has been filed.

At the same time, the Department is persuaded by some commenters who expressed concern that it may be too difficult to ensure that mediation or other informal resolution is truly voluntary on the part of students who report being sexually harassed by a recipient's employee, due to the power differential and potential for undue influence or pressure exerted by an employee over a student. For this reason, the Department has revised § 106.45(b)(9)(iii) to state that recipients cannot offer an informal resolution process to resolve formal complaints alleging that an employee sexually harassed a student.

grievance processes, we leave this possibility open to recipients. If recipients were to accept such witnesses, then the Department would expect this possibility to be clearly disclosed to the parties as part of the § 106.45(b)(9)(i) requirement in the final regulations to provide a written notice disclosing any consequences resulting from participating in the informal resolution process, including the records that will be maintained or could be shared.

Changes: The Department has made several changes to the informal resolution provision that we proposed in the NPRM. Individuals facilitating informal resolution must be free from conflicts of interest, bias, and trained to serve impartially.[1504] Informal resolution processes must have reasonably prompt time frames.[1505] The initial written notice of allegations sent to both parties must include information about any informal resolution processes the recipient has chosen to make available.[1506] In the informal resolution provision itself, § 106.45(b)(9), the final regulations now provide that recipients are explicitly prohibited from requiring students or employees to waive their right to a formal § 106.45 grievance process as a condition of enrollment or employment or enjoyment of any other right; recipients are explicitly prohibited from requiring the parties to participate in an informal resolution process; a recipient may not offer informal resolution unless a formal complaint is filed; either party has the right to withdraw from informal resolution and resume a § 106.45 grievance process at any time before agreeing to a resolution; and recipients are categorically prohibited from offering or facilitating an informal resolution process to resolve allegations that an employee sexually harassed a student.

Terminology Clarifications

Comments: A number of commenters expressed concerns regarding the terminology surrounding informal resolution in the NPRM. Commenters stated that calling this process ''informal'' can cause recipients to underestimate the training, skill, and preparation necessary to successfully execute this resolution method, and it might also lead recipients to treat sexual misconduct claims with greater skepticism than other misconduct. Several commenters argued that mediation is inappropriate in sexual misconduct cases because it suggests both parties are at fault. Many commenters contended that mediation is categorically inappropriate in sexual assault cases, even on a voluntary basis, because of the power differential between assailants and victims, the potential for re-traumatization by having to face the attacker again, the implication that survivors share partial responsibility for their own assault, the seriousness of the offense, and the inadequate punishment imposed on offenders. Other commenters, however, argued that informal resolution of disputed sexual harassment allegations often provides both parties with a preferable outcome to formal adjudication procedures. Some commenters suggested that the Department clearly define what ''informal resolution'' is in the final regulations and also explain the relationship and possible overlap between informal resolution and the ''supportive measures'' contemplated in the NPRM. One commenter asked whether the provisions requiring written notice be provided to ''parties'' refers only to complainants and respondents, or whether parents and/or legal guardians would receive notice instead where the complainant and/or respondent is a minor or legally incompetent person.

Discussion: It is not the intent of the Department in referring to resolution processes under § 106.45(b)(9) as ''informal'' to suggest that personnel who facilitate such processes need not have robust training and independence, or that recipients should take allegations of sexual harassment less seriously when reaching a resolution through such processes. Indeed, the Department acknowledges the concerns raised by some commenters regarding the training and independence of individuals who facilitate informal resolutions. In response to these well-taken comments, we have extended the anti-conflict of interest, anti-bias, and training requirements of § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to these personnel in the final regulations. The same requirements that apply to Title IX Coordinators, investigators, and decision-makers now also apply to any individuals who facilitate informal resolution processes. Contrary to the claims made by some commenters that mediation is categorically inappropriate, the Department believes that recipients' good judgment and common sense should be important elements of a response to sex discrimination under Title IX.

The Department believes an explicit definition of ''informal resolution'' in the final regulations is unnecessary. Informal resolution may encompass a broad range of conflict resolution strategies, including, but not limited to, arbitration, mediation, or restorative justice. Defining this concept may have the unintended effect of limiting parties' freedom to choose the resolution option that is best for them, and recipient flexibility to craft resolution processes that serve the unique educational needs of their communities.

With respect to the relationship between supportive measures and informal resolution, the Department wishes to clarify that supportive measures are designed to restore or preserve equal access to the recipient's education program or activity without unreasonably burdening the other party and without constituting punitive or disciplinary actions including by protecting the safety of all parties and the recipient's educational environment or deterring sexual harassment. Unlike informal resolutions, which may result in disciplinary measures designed to punish the respondent, supportive measures must be non-disciplinary and non-punitive. Supportive measures may include counseling, extensions of deadlines or other course-related adjustments, modifications of work or class schedules, campus escort services, mutual restrictions on contact between the parties, changes in work or housing locations, leaves of absence, increased security and monitoring of certain areas of the campus, and other similar measures. Informal resolutions may reach agreements between the parties, facilitated by the recipient, that include similar measures but that also could include disciplinary measures, while providing finality for both parties in terms of resolving allegations raised in a formal complaint of sexual harassment. Because an informal resolution may result in disciplinary or punitive measures agreed to by a respondent, we have revised § 106.45(b)(9) to expressly state that a recipient may not offer informal resolution unless a formal complaint is filed. This ensures that the parties understand the allegations at issue and the right to have the allegations resolved through the formal grievance process, and the right to voluntarily consent to participate in informal resolution.

Furthermore, the Department wishes to clarify that where the complainant or respondent is a minor or legally incompetent person, then the party's parent or legal guardian will receive the required written notice under § 106.45(b)(9) of the final regulations. The final regulations address the rights of parents and guardians in § 106.6(g), which states that nothing in the final regulations may be read in derogation of the legal rights of a parent or guardian to act on behalf of an individual.

Changes: The Department has added § 106.6(g) to acknowledge the importance of the legal rights of parents or guardians to act on behalf of individuals exercising Title IX rights or involved in Title IX proceedings. We have also revised § 106.45(b)(9) to state that no recipient may require parties to participate in informal resolution, and a recipient may not offer informal resolution unless a formal complaint has been filed.

Written Notice Implications

Comments: One commenter expressed concern that the NPRM requires written notice of the allegations provided to both parties before informal resolution. At public institutions, written notice constitutes a public record; this would frustrate the utility of informal resolution as a confidential forum. The commenter argued that the Department should either withdraw this requirement or instead extend a privilege to records created in informal resolution.

Discussion: The Department acknowledges the confidentiality concerns raised by some commenters regarding informal resolution. Section 106.45(b)(9)(i) provides that the written notice given to both parties before entering an informal resolution process must indicate what records would be maintained or could be shared in that process. Importantly, records that could potentially be kept confidential could include the written notice itself, which would not become a public record. The Department leaves it to the discretion of recipients to make these determinations. The Department believes this requirement effectively puts both parties on notice as to the confidentiality and privacy implications of participating in informal resolution. Recipients remain free to exercise their judgment in determining the confidentiality parameters of the informal resolution process they offer to parties.

Changes: None.

Voluntary Consent

Comments: Many commenters argued that the NPRM fails to ensure that the parties' consent to informal resolution is truly voluntary. Commenters argued that recipients may have perverse reputational and monetary incentives to downplay sexual misconduct claims and push parties to undergo informal resolution instead of lengthy, costly, complex, and public formal proceedings. Commenters noted these perverse incentives may be particularly strong where the respondent is a star athlete or child of a major donor. Some commenters suggested that the Department failed to consider social pressure and power disparities between parties, such as between children and teachers,[1507] and victims and domestic abusers,[1508] and their effect on the ''choice'' of informal resolution. Commenters argued that all sexual violence situations reflect power dynamics that make mediation or informal resolution not truly voluntary and pose a risk of further harm to victims.[1509] A few commenters noted that the prospect of retraumatizing cross-examination under the NPRM's grievance procedures means many parties have no real choice at all. One commenter asserted that the final regulations should require recipients to ensure the parties first confer with an advisor or counsel of their choice, and if none is available, then one provided by the recipient, so that consent to informal resolution is truly voluntary. Another commenter asserted that, to avoid recipient biases to promote their own interests, the final regulations should specify the circumstances in which recipients can recommend informal resolution. Commenters believed that mediation improperly shifts the burden of resolution to the parties, instead of school professionals. One commenter claimed that informal resolution could also violate a respondent's due process rights because recipients could impose sanctions without formally investigating the case.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the concerns expressed by many commenters regarding whether parties' consent to informal resolution is truly voluntary. To ensure that the parties do not feel forced into an informal resolution by a recipient, and to ensure that the parties have the ability to make an informed decision, § 106.45(b)(9) requires recipients to inform the parties in writing of the allegations, the requirements of the informal resolution process, any consequences resulting from participating in the informal process, and to obtain both parties' voluntary and written consent to the informal resolution process. The Department acknowledges the concerns expressed by these commenters, and the final regulations go a step further than the NPRM by explicitly prohibiting recipients from requiring the parties to participate in an informal resolution process, and expressly forbidding recipients from making participation in informal resolution a condition of admission or employment, or enjoyment of any other right. We wish to emphasize that consent to informal resolution cannot be the product of coercion or undue influence because coercion or undue influence would contradict the final regulations' prohibitions against a recipient ''requiring'' parties to participate in informal resolution, obtaining the parties' ''voluntary'' consent, and/or conditioning ''enjoyment of any other right'' on participation in informal resolution. In addition, and as discussed above, the Department believes that by extending the robust training and impartiality requirements of § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to individuals who facilitate informal resolutions, the perverse incentives and biases that may otherwise taint an informal resolution process will be effectively countered. The Department believes these requirements have the cumulative effect of ensuring that the parties' consent to informal resolution is truly voluntary, and that no party is involuntarily denied the right to have sexual harassment allegations resolved through the investigation and adjudication process provided for by the final regulations. Indeed, we believe the cumulative effect of these requirements will help to ensure that parties' consent to informal resolution is truly voluntary, and therefore we decline to mandate that the parties confer with an advisor before entering an informal resolution process, or to mandate that recipients provide the parties with advisors before entering an informal resolution process.

''voluntary'' choice of the student to engage in informal resolution actually being the product of undue influence of the employee. Because the option of informal resolution rests on the premise that no party is ever required to participate, and where each party voluntarily engages in informal resolution only because the party believes such a process may further the party's own wishes and desires, we have removed from the final regulations the option of informal resolution for any allegations that an employee sexually harassed a student. The final regulations leave recipients discretion to make informal resolution available as an option, or not, with respect to sexual harassment allegations other than when the formal complaint alleges that an employee sexually harassed a student.

Subject to the modifications made in these final regulations, described above, the Department believes that informal resolution empowers the parties by offering alternative conflict resolution systems that may serve their unique needs and provides greater flexibility to recipients in serving their educational communities. Thus, the Department concludes that permitting informal resolution is an appropriate policy development subject to the limitations and restrictions in the final regulations, notwithstanding the 2001 Guidance's position on mediation. The 2001 Guidance approved of informal resolution for sexual harassment (as opposed to sexual assault) ''if the parties agree to do so,'' cautioned that it is inappropriate for a school to simply instruct parties to work out the problem between themselves, stated that ''mediation will not be appropriate even on a voluntary basis'' in cases of alleged sexual assault, and stated that the complainant must be notified of the right to end the informal process at any time and begin the formal complaint process.[1510] Within the conditions, restrictions, and parameters the final regulations place on a recipient's facilitation of informal resolution, we believe that the concerns underlying the Department's prior position regarding mediation are ameliorated, while providing the benefits of informal resolution as an option where that option is deemed potentially effective by the recipient and all parties to the formal complaint. The Department notes that nothing in § 106.45(b)(9) requires an informal resolution process to involve the parties confronting each other or even being present in the same room; mediations are often conducted with the parties in separate rooms and the mediator conversing with each party separately. The final regulations ensure that only a person free from bias or conflict of interest, trained on how to serve impartially, will facilitate an informal resolution process. Further, we have revised § 106.45(b)(9) to expressly allow either party to withdraw from the informal resolution process and resume the grievance process with respect to the formal complaint. These provisions address the concerns about mediation addressed in the 2001 Guidance, without removing informal resolution as an option for cases where informal resolution may present the parties with a more desirable process and outcome than a formal investigation and adjudication.

We believe concerns about perverse institutional incentives to promote informal resolutions will be adequately addressed by the robust requirements contained in the final regulations. Many commenters have asserted that a recipient's student disciplinary process traditionally has an educational rather than punitive purpose and thus object to the formal procedures prescribed under the § 106.45 grievance process. The Department believes that the option of informal resolution gives recipients an avenue for using the disciplinary process to educate and change behavior in a way that the adversarial formal grievance process might not, in situations where both parties voluntarily agree to participate. At the same time, the final regulations ensure that recipients cannot require the parties to use informal resolution, the parties must give voluntary consent to informal resolution, and the recipient cannot condition enrollment, employment, or enjoyment of any other right, on participation in informal resolution. Recipients also must not intimidate, threaten, or coerce any person for the purpose of interfering with a person's rights under Title IX,[1511] including the right to voluntarily decide whether or not to participate in informal resolution. These requirements counteract incentives a recipient may have to pressure parties to engage in informal resolution.

We disagree that mediation improperly shifts the burden of resolution to the parties instead of school professionals, and that informal resolution could violate a respondent's due process rights. Informal resolution under the final regulations is not possible without the informed, voluntary consent of all parties, and persons who facilitate informal resolution must be well-trained pursuant to § 106.45(b)(1)(iii). Recipients must explain the parameters and processes, consequences, and confidentiality implications of informal resolution to the parties. Furthermore, the final regulations respond to commenters' concerns by expressly providing that either party can withdraw from the informal resolution process at any time prior to reaching a final resolution and resume the formal grievance process. A benefit of informal resolution may be that parties have a greater sense of personal autonomy and control over how particular allegations are resolved; however, where that avenue is not desirable to either party, for any reason, the party is never required to participate in informal resolution.

Changes: None.

Safety Concerns Based on Confidentiality

Comments: A few commenters expressed concerns that the confidential nature of informal resolution could present safety risks to the survivor and broader campus community because informal resolutions such as mediation often happen behind closed doors and the broader school community and other students may not become aware of the risks posed by the perpetrator and so cannot take precautions.[1512] Further, some commenters believed that confidentiality requirements in resolution agreements could silence survivors who would otherwise raise awareness of the allegations and

In addition, the complainant must be notified of the right to end the informal process at any time and begin the formal stage of the complaint process. criticize the recipient's handling of the case.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the concerns raised by some commenters that the confidential nature of informal resolutions may mean that the broader educational community is unaware of the risks posed by a perpetrator; however, the final regulations impose robust disclosure requirements on recipients to ensure that parties are fully aware of the consequences of choosing informal resolution, including the records that will be maintained or that could or could not be shared, and the possibility of confidentiality requirements as a condition of entering a final agreement. We believe as a fundamental principle that parties and individual recipients are in the best position to determine the conflict resolution process that works for them; for example, a recipient may determine that confidentiality restrictions promote mutually beneficial resolutions between parties and encourage complainants to report,[1513] or may determine that the benefits of keeping informal resolution outcomes confidential are outweighed by the need for the educational community to have information about the number or type of sexual harassment incidents being resolved.[1514] The recipient's determination about the confidentiality of informal resolutions may be influenced by the model(s) of informal resolution a recipient chooses to offer; for example, a mediation model may result in a mutually agreed upon resolution to the situation without the respondent admitting responsibility, while a restorative justice model may reach a mutual resolution that involves the respondent admitting responsibility. The final regulations permit recipients to consider such aspects of informal resolution processes and decide to offer, or not offer, such processes, but require the recipient to inform the parties of the nature and consequences of any such informal resolution processes.

Changes: None.

Consistency With Other Law and Practice

Comments: A number of commenters asserted that informal resolution under the NPRM would trigger conflict with other Federal and State law and is inconsistent with best practices. For example, some commenters stated that the Department failed to provide a reasoned explanation for allowing mediation, given that such a position was rejected by both the Bush and Obama Administrations for serious sexual misconduct cases. Several commenters suggested that informal resolutions such as mediation will chill reporting. Commenters urged the Department to preserve the approach to mediation contained in the 2001 Guidance. Commenters asserted that the Department of Justice has traditionally discouraged use of mediation in sexual and intimate partner violence cases and that some Federal programs prohibit grant recipients serving victims from engaging clients in mediation related to their abuse; commenters argued that all sexual violence cases but especially those involving children and domestic abusers, involve power differential dynamics that make mediation high-risk for the complainants.[1515] A few commenters argued that the NPRM's conflicts with State law regarding mediation could trigger enforcement problems, cause confusion for recipients and students, impose additional cost burdens, and prompt lengthy litigation. Commenters argued that since 2000, the American Bar Association (ABA) has recommended that mediation generally not be used in domestic violence cases. And one commenter asserted that the Department should not hold schools to lower standards than U.S. companies, many of which are withdrawing mandatory mediation, arbitration, and other alternative dispute resolution in their employee contracts. Some commenters asserted that smaller recipients may not have adequate resources and staff to handle mediations and other informal resolutions.

Discussion: The Department acknowledges there may be differences between the approach to informal resolution contained in the final regulations and other Federal practices relating to informal resolution. As discussed above, the Department believes that the concerns underlying the position on mediation in the 2001 Guidance are adequately addressed by these final regulations, including modifications in response to commenters' concerns that allegations involving sexual harassment of a student by an employee pose a significant risk of ostensibly ''voluntary'' consent to mediation (or other informal resolution) being the product of undue pressure by the respondent on the complainant, and thus the final regulations preclude informal resolution as an option with respect to allegations that an employee sexually harassed a student. Because informal resolution is only an option, and is never required, under the final regulations, the Department does not believe that § 106.45(b)(9) presents conflict with other Federal or State laws or practices concerning resolution of sexual harassment allegations through mediation or other alternative dispute resolution processes.[1516]

The Department believes that an option of mediation may encourage reporting of sexual harassment incidents,[1517] but reiterates that the final regulations do not require any recipient to offer informal resolution and preclude a party from being required to participate in informal resolution.

The Department agrees that informal resolution should not be mandatory, and the final regulations explicitly prohibit recipients from requiring students or employees to waive their right to a § 106.45 investigation and adjudication of formal complaints as a condition of enrollment or continuing enrollment, or employment or continuing employment with the recipient. Recipients cannot force individuals to undergo informal resolution under the final regulations. Furthermore, the Department reiterates that nothing in the final regulations requires recipients to offer an informal resolution process. Recipients remain free to craft or not craft an informal resolution process that serves their unique educational needs; therefore, smaller recipients that may not have adequate resources or staff to handle informal resolution need not offer such processes.

Changes: None.

Training Requirements

Comments: Many commenters contended that the final regulations should impose training and qualification requirements on mediators, facilitators, arbitrators, and other staff involved in informal resolution. For example, these commenters wanted the Department to impose the same training requirements on personnel involved in formal grievance procedures as on personnel handling informal resolution; ensure no conflicts of interest; and minimize the risk of inappropriate questioning during informal process and possible re-traumatization. One commenter suggested that the Department encourage recipients to enter into memoranda of understanding (MOUs) with third-party informal resolution providers.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the well-taken concerns raised by many commenters that the NPRM did not explicitly require informal resolution personnel to be appropriately trained and qualified. As a result, as discussed above, we have revised § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) of the final regulations to require recipients to ensure any individuals who facilitate an informal resolution process must receive training on the definition of sexual harassment contained in § 106.30 and the scope of the recipient's education program or activity; how to conduct informal resolution processes; and how to serve impartially, including by avoiding prejudgment of the facts at issue, conflicts of interest, or bias. As such, the Department believes that it is unnecessary to encourage recipients to enter MOUs with third party informal resolution providers, though the Department notes that the final regulations permit recipients to outsource informal resolutions to third party providers.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(1)(iii) to include persons who facilitate an informal resolution process as persons who must be free from conflicts of interest and bias and receive the same training as that provision requires for Title IX Coordinators, investigators, and decision-makers.

Non-Binding Informal Resolution

Comments: Several commenters asserted that the Department should allow mediation but require recipients to allow parties to return to formal proceedings if they want to; otherwise respondents might have less incentive to mediate in good faith and reach a reasonable outcome. If mediation is binding, respondents may have no incentive to mediate in good faith and reach a reasonable outcome. A few commenters argued that schools must not offer a one-time choice of informal mediation versus formal investigation. Survivors need to be able to change their minds; their access to education can change over time. One commenter asserted that informal resolution should only be binding where all parties voluntarily agree on a resolution and the agreement's terms are not breached. This commenter suggested that the final regulations should include a provision stating that any agreement reached in informal resolution or mediation must be signed by all parties, clearly specify the terms by which the case is resolved, establish consequences for breaching the agreement, detail how the parties can report breach of agreement, and define how the breach would be addressed.

Discussion: The Department acknowledges that the NPRM proposed to allow recipients to prohibit parties from leaving the informal resolution process and returning to a formal grievance process. As noted above, we have amended our approach to this issue such that § 106.45(b)(9) of the final regulations explicitly permits either party to withdraw from an informal resolution at any time before agreeing to a resolution and resume the grievance process under § 106.45. The Department expects informal resolution agreements to be treated as contracts; the parties remain free to negotiate the terms of the agreement and, once entered into, it may become binding according to its terms. The Department believes the cumulative effect of these provisions will help to ensure that informal resolutions such as mediation are conducted in good faith and that these processes may reach reasonable outcomes satisfactory to both parties. As such, the Department believes the alternative approaches offered by some commenters, such as requiring a new subsection provision that would cover breaches of informal resolution agreements, are unnecessary to address such concerns.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(9) to provide that any party may withdraw from informal resolution at any time prior to agreeing to a resolution, and resume the formal grievance process.

Survivor-Oriented Protections

Comments: A few commenters asserted the final regulations should include explicit protections for survivors in the informal resolution process. For example, the final regulations should prohibit in-person questioning during informal process but allow written submissions by the parties to avoid re-traumatization. Commenters suggested that the final regulations should categorically prohibit schools from requiring complainants to resolve the problem alone with the respondent. Some commenters stated that if mediation is an option, survivors should determine the format, such as having someone sit in on their behalf or requiring the parties to be in separate rooms. Otherwise, the process could become irresponsible and cause more harm than good. A few commenters asserted that the final regulations should require recipients to evaluate all potential risks before proposing informal resolution. One commenter suggested that § 106.44(c) regarding safety and risk analysis for emergency removals could be a model for informal resolutions, such that recipients should thoroughly investigate the situation and parties' relationship to ensure informal resolution is appropriate.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the suggestions offered by some commenters to include explicit survivor-oriented protections in the informal resolution provisions in § 106.45(b)(9) of the final regulations. The Department declines to make these changes because the changes would restrict recipients' flexibility and discretion in satisfying their Title IX obligations and meeting the needs of the members of their educational community. The Department believes that the parties are in the best position to make the right decision for themselves when choosing informal resolution, and that choice will be limited in scope based on what informal processes a recipient has deemed appropriate and has chosen to make available. As such, we believe that to require a safety and risk analysis before recipients may offer informal resolutions would be unnecessary, though nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient from following such a practice. Similarly, nothing in § 106.45(b)(9) precludes a recipient from categorically refusing to offer and facilitate an informal process that involves the parties directly interacting, from prohibiting a facilitator from directly questioning parties, or from requiring the parties to be in separate rooms.

Changes: None.

Restorative Justice

Comments: Many commenters opposed mediation but supported expanding access to, and Department funding of, restorative justice. These commenters raised the point that restorative justice requires the perpetrator to admit wrongdoing from the beginning and work to redress the harm caused, whereas mediation requires no admission of guilt, implicitly rests on the premise both parties are partially at fault for the situation and must meet in the middle, and often entails debate over the facts. Commenters cited studies suggesting restorative justice has resulted in reduced recidivism for offenders and better outcomes for survivors.[1518] One commenter stated that many recipients currently implement restorative justice, but only where the respondent is willing to accept responsibility, and stated that the process does not require face-to-face meeting between the parties, and the most severe misconduct is not eligible. One commenter was concerned that because § 106.45(b)(9) suggests informal processes can only be facilitated prior to reaching a determination regarding responsibility this can complicate or end up precluding restorative justice, because restorative justice requires admission of responsibility before participation.

Discussion: The Department appreciates commenters' support for restorative justice as a viable method of informal resolution, commenters' concerns regarding mediation, and the common differences between the two resolution processes.[1519] One of the underlying purposes of § 106.45(b)(9) is to recognize the importance of recipient autonomy and the freedom of parties to choose a resolution mechanism that best suits their needs. As such, nothing in § 106.45(b)(9) prohibits recipients from using restorative justice as an informal resolution process to address sexual misconduct incidents.

With respect to the implications of restorative justice and the recipient reaching a determination regarding responsibility, the Department acknowledges that generally a critical feature of restorative justice is that the respondent admits responsibility at the start of the process. However, this admission of responsibility does not necessarily mean the recipient has also reached that determination, and participation in restorative justice as a type of informal resolution must be a voluntary decision on the part of the respondent. Therefore, the language limiting the availability of an informal resolution process only to a time period before there is a determination of responsibility does not prevent a recipient from using the process of restorative justice under § 106.45(b)(9), and a recipient has discretion under this provision to specify the circumstances under which a respondent's admission of responsibility while participating in a restorative justice model would, or would not, be used in an adjudication if either party withdraws from the informal process and resumes the formal grievance process. Similarly, a recipient could use a restorative justice model after a determination of responsibility finds a respondent responsible; nothing in the final regulations dictates the form of disciplinary sanction a recipient may or must impose on a respondent.

Changes: None.

Avoiding Formal Process

Comments: One commenter expressed concern that recipients could simply offer informal resolution and only informal resolution to get around the NPRM's formal process requirements. To address this, the commenter argued the final regulations should clearly state that recipients must implement a formal resolution process regardless of their choice to facilitate an informal resolution process.

Discussion: The Department acknowledges the concern that under the NPRM it may have appeared that recipients could avoid formal grievance procedures altogether by solely offering informal resolution. To address this concern, we have revised § 106.45(b)(9) to preclude recipients from requiring students or employees to waive their rights to a § 106.45 grievance process as a condition of enrollment or employment, or enjoyment of any other right, include a statement that a recipient may never require participation in informal resolution, and clarify that a recipient may not offer informal resolution unless a formal complaint is filed. As such, recipients must establish a grievance process that complies with § 106.45 to ensure that parties' Title IX rights are realized, and the parties may participate in informal resolution only after a formal complaint has been filed, ensuring that the parties are therefore aware of the allegations at issue and the formal procedures for investigation and adjudication that will apply absent an informal resolution process.

Changes: The Department has revised § 106.45(b)(9) to preclude a recipient from requiring any party to waive the right to a formal grievance process as a condition of enrollment, employment, or enjoyment of any other right, that a recipient may never require participation in informal resolution, and that a recipient may not offer informal resolution unless a formal complaint is filed.

Electronic Disclosures

Comments: One commenter asserted that the Department should allow electronic disclosures and signatures to obtain parties' consent to informal resolution to enhance privacy and security of sensitive documents, and because written notice requirements are costly and unnecessary in 2019.

Discussion: The final regulations do not specify the method of delivery for written notices and disclosures required under the final regulations, including the method by which the recipient must obtain parties' voluntary written consent to informal resolution. The Department acknowledges the potential convenience, privacy, and security benefits of shifting from physical disclosures and signatures to electronic disclosures and signatures but leaves recipients with discretion as to the method of delivery of written notices under § 106.45(b)(9).

Changes: None.

Expulsion Through Informal Resolution

Comments: One commenter argued that expulsion is an inappropriate sanction for informal resolution, and the Department should prohibit schools from expelling students through

A party can 'lose' or be penalized; mediation only requires that the loss or penalty is agreed to by both parties—in a sexual assault case, 'agreements . . . may include reconciliation, restitution for the victim, rehabilitation for whoever needs it, and the acceptance of responsibility by the offender.'") (internal citations omitted).

informal resolution to ensure a fair process for all.

Discussion: The Department believes that the robust disclosure requirements of § 106.45(b)(9), the requirement that both parties provide voluntary written consent to informal resolution, and the explicit right of either party to withdraw from the informal resolution process at any time prior to agreeing to the resolution (which may or may not include expulsion of the respondent), will adequately protect the respondent's interest in a fair process before the sanction of expulsion is imposed. Accordingly, the Department believes that prohibiting recipients from using informal resolution where it results in expulsion is unnecessary; if expulsion is the sanction proposed as part of an informal resolution process, that result can only occur if both parties agree to the resolution. If a respondent, for example, does not believe that expulsion is appropriate then the respondent can withdraw from the informal resolution process and resume the formal grievance process under which the recipient must complete a fair investigation and adjudication, render a determination regarding responsibility, and only then decide on any disciplinary sanction.

Changes: None.

Clarification Requests

Comments: Several commenters raised questions regarding the informal resolution provisions of the NPRM. One commenter inquired as to whether a time frame could apply after which neither party could ask for an ongoing informal resolution process to be set aside and proceed with formal investigation and adjudication. One commenter raised concerns regarding recipients' legal liability if the informal resolution process included a respondent's acknowledgement of a policy violation, but the respondent was allowed to remain on campus and violated that same policy again. One commenter sought clarification as to whether informal resolution could include a respondent taking responsibility and accepting disciplinary action without any meeting or process at all. One commenter raised questions as to what happens to ongoing informal resolution process where more complaints are brought against the same respondent. One commenter asked whether parties can proceed with informal resolution even where the recipient believes it is inappropriate to resolve the case. One commenter inquired whether the NPRM's informal resolution provisions only apply where a formal complaint was filed against the respondent. And one commenter sought clarification as to whether schools remain free to prohibit informal resolutions under the NPRM.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the questions raised by commenters regarding § 106.45(b)(9). The final regulations clarify that either party can withdraw from the informal resolution process and resume the formal grievance process at any time prior to agreeing to a resolution. The Department appreciates the opportunity to clarify here that informal resolution compliant with § 106.45(b)(9) is a method of resolving allegations in a formal complaint of sexual harassment. Because a recipient must investigate and adjudicate allegations in a formal complaint, informal resolution stands as a potential alternative to completing the investigation and adjudication that the final regulations otherwise require. Under the final regulations, a recipient may not offer informal resolution unless a formal complaint has been filed.

With respect to recipients' potential legal liability where the respondent acknowledges commission of Title IX sexual harassment (or other violation of recipient's policy) during an informal resolution process, yet the agreement reached allows the respondent to remain on campus and the respondent commits Title IX sexual harassment (or violates the recipient's policy) again, the Department believes that recipients should have the flexibility and discretion to determine under what circumstances respondents should be suspended or expelled from campus as a disciplinary sanction, whether that follows from an informal resolution or after a determination of responsibility under the formal grievance process. Recipients may take into account legal obligations unrelated to Title IX, and relevant Title IX case law under which Federal courts have considered a recipient's duty not to be deliberately indifferent by exposing potential victims to repeat misconduct of a respondent, when considering what sanctions to impose against a particular respondent. The Department declines to adopt a rule that would mandate suspension or expulsion as the only appropriate sanction following a determination of responsibility against a respondent; recipients deserve flexibility to design sanctions that best reflect the needs and values of the recipient's educational mission and community, and that most appropriately address the unique circumstances of each case. While Federal courts have found recipients to be deliberately indifferent where the recipient failed to take measures to avoid subjecting students to discrimination in light of known circumstances that included a respondent's prior sexual misconduct,[1520] courts have also emphasized that the deliberate indifference standard is not intended to imply that a school must suspend or expel every respondent found responsible for sexual harassment.[1521]

The Department reiterates that the final regulations do not require recipients to establish an informal resolution process. As such, if recipients believe it is inappropriate, undesirable, or infeasible to use informal resolution to address sexual harassment under Title IX, then recipients may instead offer only the § 106.45 grievance process involving investigation and adjudication of formal complaints.

Changes: We have revised § 106.45(b)(9) to state that recipients may not offer informal resolution unless a formal complaint has been filed.

Recordkeeping

Section 106.45(b)(10) Recordkeeping and Directed Question 8

Comments: Many commenters expressed general support for the recordkeeping requirements in § 106.45(b)(10). Some commenters expressed that this provision would improve the overall transparency and integrity of the Title IX grievance process, discourage colleges and universities from utilizing training materials that employ sex stereotypes, and encourage recipients to adopt a high standard of training that provides investigators with proper trauma training. Many commenters, however, [1520] E.g., Williams v. Bd. of Regents of Univ. Sys. of Ga., 477 F.3d 1282, 1296–97 (11th Cir. 2007).

[1521] E.g., id. at 1297 (suspending or expelling offenders would have been one measure the university could have taken to avoid subjecting the plaintiff to discrimination in the form of further sexual misconduct perpetrated by the offenders, but other measures could also have been pursued by the university, such as removal of the offenders from their housing, or implementing a more protective sexual harassment policy to address future incidents); Davis v. Monroe Cnty. Bd. of Educ., 546 U.S. 629, 648 (1999) (''We thus disagree with respondents' contention that, if Title IX provides a cause of action for student-on-student harassment, 'nothing short of expulsion of every student accused of misconduct involving sexual overtones would protect school systems from liability or damages.' ('[A] school must immediately suspend or expel a student accused of sexual harassment'). Likewise, the dissent erroneously imagines that victims of peer harassment now have a Title IX right to make particular remedial demands. See post, at 34 (contemplating that victim could demand new desk assignment). In fact, as we have previously noted, courts should refrain from second guessing the disciplinary decisions made by school administrators.'').

opposed any recordkeeping requirement, arguing that these requirements are not victim-centered or trauma-informed, that it is burdensome, time consuming, and will greatly slow the investigation process.

Some commenters stated that several institutions of higher educations' retention policies dictate keeping records for even longer periods of time than the three years suggested in the NPRM, and that lengthening the retention period in this provision would facilitate the parties' abilities to prepare cases and appeals.

Many commenters opposed the recordkeeping requirement. The commenters stated that a three-year time period fails to take into account that State law may require a longer period of retention, or that three years often does not cover a student's educational tenure at an institution. They also argued that this closely resembles requirements in the criminal justice system, which will reduce the likelihood of an erroneous finding of guilt. Many of the commenters opposed the three-year period of retention of records as being too short. Because most students take more than three years to graduate from an institution of higher education, a student's record could be erased prior to their graduation. This could limit a recipient's ability to fully address sporadic but repeated sex discrimination that fails to garner the notice of recipients and is lost forever in records discarded from three years prior. Also, such circumstances could trigger the Title IX Coordinator's duty to file a formal complaint under proposed § 106.44(b)(2). As the average graduation rate at an institution of higher education is six years, there may be times in which a respondent had a prior allegation in year one, and another allegation in year five. Commenters also asked whether the Title IX Coordinator is required to bring forward a complaint, and if so, what records would be used if this three-year period had passed?

Commenters asserted that freshmen college students are more likely to be involved in a sexual harassment proceeding than upperclassmen and thus by allowing schools to destroy these records before such a freshman student graduates, the recipient and the larger community might be prevented from learning from the earlier incident if the respondent reoffends.

Commenters argued that for students attending schools where they could be present for more than three years, such as a K–8 school, students could outlast the record of their harassment or assault, even within a single institution. Commenters argued that it makes little sense for a student sexually harassed in the third grade to enter the seventh grade, at the same institution, without a record of those past experiences; for example, the perpetrator might be placed in a survivor's class and the relevant teachers might not understand how to implement appropriate supportive measures. Commenters asserted that for elementary and secondary school students, these records are important when students transfer between schools or school districts, and that a funding recipient must know when a new student at their school has been sexually assaulted or harassed in the past in order to provide appropriate services.

Other commenters opposed the three-year retention period on the grounds that it would impair the legal rights of minor children, and is inconsistent with State statutes of limitations, if evidence surrounding the student's harassment and their schools' response was unavailable because it was older than three years. Commenters stated that many States allow for minors to file civil suits only once they reach the age of majority, and that Federal and State laws consistently toll relevant statute of limitations periods until minors reach the age of majority and have the ability to vindicate their own rights, recognizing that they should not be punished for the failure of a guardian to file a claim on their behalf.

Several commenters stated that, in the case of employee-on-student harassment and ''sexually predatory educators,'' this would allow employee records to be periodically cleansed of evidence of wrongdoing relatively quickly (three years), thereby putting future students at risk.

Other commenters stated that the three-year retention period is so short that it would limit complainants' ability to succeed in a Title IX lawsuit or OCR complaint because it would allow recipients to destroy relevant records before a party has had the opportunity to file a complaint or complete discovery, and therefore escape liability. Commenters recommended the provision be modified to state: ''If litigation is pursued before the expiration of the three-year period, records should be kept until the final action is completed.'' Commenters argued that the Title IX statute does not contain a statute of limitations, so courts generally apply the statute of limitation of the most analogous State laws regarding retention periods or statutes, e.g., a State's civil rights statute or personal injury statute which varies from one to six years.

Many commenters found the three-year retention period confusing and argued that the Department provided no rationale for it. Commenters stated the retention period would conflict with State requirements, or other disciplinary actions (e.g., long-term suspension) that require longer document retention (e.g., in Washington State, districts must retain records related to discrimination complaints for six years.)

Several commenters, in asserting that the three-year retention period is too short, proposed alternate retention periods. One commenter stated, in order to avoid conflict with State requirements, the Department should modify § 106.45(b)(10) to read: ''maintain for a minimum of three years or as required by State statute . . .'' or ''seven years, or 3 years after all parties graduate, whichever is sooner,'' or keeping records until one year after a student graduates. Some commenters stated the retention period should not be tied to the Clery Act's limitation period for reporting specific campus crimes in an annual security report. (Clery Act, 20 U.S.C. 1092(f); 34 CFR 668.46(c)(1) (requiring schools to annually report all crimes which occurred in the prior three calendar years by the end of the following year). Other commenters suggested the period be six years, or modified to state ''files should be retained for the time the student is involved on campus and extended for a reasonable time period that considers the student may enroll for a graduate degree.''

Many commenters proposed that records be kept for a minimum of seven years, instead of three, in keeping with best practices for student record-keeping as well as general accounting practices. Some commenters stated medical and tax records are required to be kept for seven years, so records of sexual abuse should be kept for the same amount of time, if not more. Furthermore, the commenters stated a three-year period would hinder the Department's efforts to ensure compliance, especially if a continuing violation is alleged or class-wide discrimination is occurring over multiple years, and conflict with the Clery records retention requirement of seven years. Rather, commenters asserted, this section should mirror the Clery Act retention effective time period requirement of seven years to avoid confusion and the potential for documents to be misfiled and destroyed. Commenters recommended this provision be modified to state: ''All records must be kept for at least three years following the generation of the last record associated with the report or complaint.'' Or: ''. . . and maintain for a period of three years from the date the disciplinary proceedings, including any appeals, is completed.'' Commenters also requested to extend the time period by stating: ''. . . or in the presence of an active investigation by OCR or other court system, until the investigation and determination is completed.'' Commenters noted that in the past, OCR complaints involving campus sexual assault have taken an average of more than four years to resolve.

Many commenters recommended that the retention period be linked to the parties' attendance in the recipient's program or activity. For example, commenters referenced the FERPA statute in recommending that the standard time period for retention be five to seven years after graduation or separation from an institution. Other commenters recommended the retention period be changed to three years or the point at which any parties are no longer in attendance at the institution, whichever comes later. Commenters stated that three-year retention period should be limited to student-complainants or student-respondents because if one or both parties are staff or faculty, their association with the recipient may extend for many years. Commenters recommended that § 106.45(b)(10) require the recipient to create, gather, and maintain the records for the duration of the students' time in school and then five years after the last student involved has graduated, and to define all important terms in a way that prevents loopholes and misconduct.

Other commenters recommended that recipients be allowed to determine the appropriate amount of time to retain records, in keeping with their own policies. Commenters requested that this requirement be made permissive for elementary and secondary school recipients—that such recipients ''may'' create records—and may only retain them for one year, stating that some primary or secondary schools are not required to maintain these kinds of records, and may not retain them in excess of one year.

Some commenters recommended that records be maintained for a minimum of ten years, arguing that, if not, the proposed rules would decrease the volume of relevant records, and in turn burden the Federal government because Federal background clearance investigations would become unreliable; agencies would inevitably make a favorable national security clearance or employment suitability determination without being aware of a candidate's past proven sexual assault if it occurred more than three years prior.

Some commenters stated that records should be kept based on the criminal justice systems' statutes of limitations, if not longer, to ensure consistency between institutional standards and State standards and ensuring parties can appropriately represent themselves. The three-year requirement could undermine criminal prosecutions related to the incidents at issue because it would permit recipients to discard vital records that could help the criminal prosecution of sexual assault or rape before the statute of limitations for such crimes has run, thereby potentially letting the perpetrators go free. For example, commenters contended, an elementary and secondary school could have ceased maintaining records of a sexual assault investigation before the student reaches the age of 18 and has the ability to vindicate their own rights. Other commenters argued that, if the underlying offense can still be prosecuted ten years after it occurred, then the recipient has a duty to retain those records for an equal length of time, especially if any aspect of the school's investigation had to be put on hold for ''good cause,'' e.g., until police and the court system have wrapped up their investigations.

Some commenters asserted that records should be kept at least as long as the educational program at which the events took place exists, if not indefinitely. Otherwise, they argue, it would allow the records of employees, who may have a longer tenure at an institution, to be periodically cleansed of any evidence of wrongdoing. Most students attend the same institution for four or more years during their elementary school, middle school, high school, college, and graduate school experiences. Commenters argued that an indefinite timeline is critical to ensure that complainants have ongoing access to their files and evidence to allow them flexibility to pursue the Title IX or criminal law process when it is safe and appropriate for them. Some commenters argued that if a complainant chooses to access the legal system simultaneously or independently from the institution, their evidence should be accessible to them at any point in time. If someone were to make a report within their first year of enrollment, and waited longer than the proposed three years to go through with a formal investigation or hearing, the complainant would not have access to the information shared when they had a fresher memory of the incident. Commenters stated that complainants may not come forward immediately for various reasons, including trauma, youth, coping mechanisms, lapses in memory, fear of re-assault, escalation, or retaliation.

Commenters asserted that three years is too short a time period to allow OCR to conduct a thorough investigation of the prevalence of sexual harassment in a recipient's programs or activities and that it would also not allow recipients to monitor campus climate, identify trends in sexual misconduct that need to be addressed on a community level, or flag sexual predators. Commenters argued that problematic sexual behavior tends to develop and escalate over time, and that if school systems keep track of developing behavior patterns, they can both prevent future violations and ensure that the individual with the problematic behavior pattern receive educational intervention to prevent the individual from forfeiting the individual's education by committing, for example, criminal offenses. Recipients, commenters stated, could maintain records indefinitely in a digital cloud account.

Several commenters requested further clarification as to what types of records a recipient should keep. Commenters asked whether the recipient should keep transcripts of hearings or merely a list of steps taken. Other commenters asked when the clock begins to calculate the time at which recipients may destroy records: Does the time toll from the date of the incident or the date the incident is reported? Or does the clock begin at the conclusion of the complaint?

Several commenters stated that the requirement about access to records seemed to contradict the provision that requires supportive measures to be kept confidential. Commenters argued that this provision will erode any confidentiality in the Title IX office and create institutional liability. Commenters also queried whether the recordkeeping provision encompasses an investigation of unwelcome conduct on the basis of sex that did not effectively deny the victim equal access to the recipient's program or activity and was not otherwise sexual harassment within the meaning of § 106.30.

Several commenters requested that access to records be limited, that they not be made available through the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA), that access be in accordance with FERPA, and that § 106.45(b)(7)(i)(A) be modified to include ''their sexual harassment investigation . . .'' to avoid the burdensome interpretation that complainants and respondents may have access to ''each sexual harassment investigation'' maintained by the recipient. Similarly, commenters requested that this provision require that any records collected be protected in a manner that will not permit access to the personal identification of students to individuals or entities other than the authorized representatives of the Secretary; and that any personally identifiable data be destroyed at the end of the retention period.

Some commenters argued that the required access to records is ambiguous and vague. Several commenters requested further clarification on the parameters of this requirement, including whether the access requirement affords the complainant and respondent access to each other's files, or just their own. Another commenter asked whether a recipient who chose to take no action at all in response to a report of sexual harassment must maintain a record of the report. A commenter also asked whether the provision applies only to reports or complaints that were known at the time to an individual with authority to institute corrective measures.

Several commenters who were in overall support of the provision stated that a recipient's Title IX training materials should be made publicly available because this allows the training materials to be assessed for fairness, absence of bias, and respect for the parties. Many commenters stated that training should be available to all students, teachers, parents, and the public because and it may help students decide which college to attend, and that the training needs to incorporate due process protections, be evidence-based, and focused on determining the truth. Commenters stated that public dissemination of the training materials would keep a check on quality of training and promote accountability and confidence in the Title IX grievance system.

Commenters requested that the requirement concerning the retention of training materials only pertain to changes that are of material significance; updates that are proofreading or aesthetic in nature should not require notation. Commenters also recommended that the provision narrow the required window for archiving of training materials to three years prior to the date of the hearing.

Some commenters found this requirement confusing, unnecessary, and burdensome. Commenters queried about the type of documentation that must be maintained regarding training, and that data and storage requirements to maintain records for three years could become burdensome for smaller recipients. Some commenters suggested that a list of annual training, including topics and who attended, be maintained instead.

Some commenters opposed the provision and requested that recipients keep an internal database of all sexual harassment reports, so that after a second or third independent report from a different complainant, a school can escalate its response to the alleged harassment to prevent further harm. Other commenters requested the entire deletion of subsection (D), asserting that: The provision does not explain what OCR's expectations will be regarding the training, so it is impossible to know what training records to maintain; training is an ongoing process that involves information from informal and formal sources; and at most, recipients should be required to summarize the qualifications of the investigators, Title IX Coordinators, and adjudicators.

Commenters who opposed § 106.45(b)(10) also requested that this provision clarify that recipients should not release information about remedies provided to the complainant as this should be kept as private as possible because remedies are often personal, and may include changes to a complainant's schedule, medical information, counseling, and academic support. Commenters argued that a respondent has little legitimate interest in knowing the complainant's remedies and could exploit such information in a retaliatory manner. Some commenters requested that if a student then sues, or goes to OCR, the college should hand over all materials without the need for legal action.

Some commenters wanted recipients to collect additional data regarding when the complaint was filed, whether there were any cross complaints, when, how, and to what extent the respondent was notified, demographic information about the parties, the number of complaints that found respondent responsible, and the sanctions.

Other commenters suggested the creation of a new section requiring recipients to send all records once a year to the Department. Some commenters requested that the Department require the collection of additional data: Number and names of Title IX staff, consultants and advisors, budget and person hours, the number of Title IX complaints reported, how each complaint was resolved, remedies provided, number of complaints deemed false accusations or where evidence did not support accusation, number of Title IX law suits by both complainants and respondents, ongoing court cases, number and type of settlements, legal costs to an institution of Title IX litigation, settlement costs to the institution and/or the institution's insurance companies. Commenters argued that demographic data on complainants and respondents would help the public evaluate whether discipline has a disparate impact on the basis of race, sex, disability, and other protected statuses, and the fact that recipients already perform such data collection for the CRDC demonstrates that postsecondary institutions could do the same without undue burden; these commenters asserted that the Department has the authority to require such data collection. Other commenters requested that discipline records prior to college must be sealed to avoid excessively harmful or unfair use of juvenile records.

Some commenters requested that the Department remove the requirement that recipients keep records for the bases of their conclusion about deliberate indifference, as this is a determination made by the Department if and when a civil rights complaint is filed.

Other commenters requested that the recordkeeping requirement exempt ombudspersons. These commenters argued that ombudspersons are objective, neutral, and confidential resources who provide information regarding the grievance process, and advocates for equitably administered processes.

Commenters suggested the deletion of the last sentence of 106.45(b)(7)(ii), ''The documentation of certain bases or measures . . . .'' The commenters argued that the sentence would allow recipients to add post hoc alterations and justifications to the record of a formal complaint, which is inconsistent with principles of basic fairness.

Discussion: The Department, having considered the commenters' concerns about the three-year retention period proposed in the NPRM, is persuaded that the three-year retention period should be extended to seven years for consistency with the Clery Act's recordkeeping requirements.[1522] Although elementary and secondary schools are not subject to the Clery Act, the Department desires to harmonize these final regulations with the obligations of institutions of higher education under the Clery Act to facilitate compliance with both the Clery Act and Title IX. At the same time, we do not believe that a seven year period rather than the proposed three-year period will be more difficult for elementary and secondary schools (who are not subject to the Clery Act), because elementary and secondary schools are often under recordkeeping requirements under other laws with retention periods of similar length. The seven-year requirement also addresses many commenters' concerns about three years being an inadequate amount of time for reasons such as a college freshman's Title IX case file being destroyed before that student has even graduated from a four-year program, or that a young student in elementary school who becomes a party to a Title IX proceeding cannot count on the student's case file being available by the time the student is in junior high, or that three years is too short a time for recipients to benefit from records of sexual harassment where a respondent re-offends years later.

The Department notes that while the final regulations require records to be kept for seven years, nothing in the final regulations prevents recipients from keeping their records for a longer period of time if the recipient wishes or due to other legal obligations. Any recipient that needs or desires to keep records for ten years to facilitate more complete Federal background checks as one commenter requested, or indefinitely as another commenter proposed, may do so. The Department declines to base this record retention provision around the potential need for use in litigation; the Department does not regulate private litigation, and in any event the Department believes that the extension of the retention period in these final regulations to seven years adequately covers the period of most statutes of limitations that apply to causes of action that may derive from the same facts and circumstances as the recipient's handling of a Title IX sexual harassment report or formal complaint. The Department declines to base the retention period around the length of time each student is enrolled by a recipient because a standardized expectation of the minimum time that these Title IX records will be kept by a recipient more easily allows a recipient to meet this requirement than if the time frames were customized to the duration of each student's enrollment.

The Department understands commenters' concerns that records of sexual harassment cases involving employees posed particular reasons supporting a longer retention period, and the modification to a seven year requirement addresses those concerns while allowing recipients to adopt a policy keeping sexual harassment records concerning employees for longer than the seven year retention period required under these final regulations.

In response to commenters' concerns that this provision giving the parties access to records might contradict the requirement to keep supportive measures confidential, the Department has revised § 106.45(b)(10)(i) to remove the language making records available to parties. Because the parties to a formal complaint receive written notice of the allegations, the evidence directly related to the allegations, the investigative report, and the written determination (as well as having the right to inspect and review the recording or transcript of a live hearing), the Department is persuaded that the parties' ability to access records relevant to their own case is sufficiently ensured without the risk that making records available to parties under proposed § 106.45(b)(10) would have resulted in disclosure to one party of the supportive measures (or remedies) provided to the other party.

Section 106.45(b)(10)(i)(A) requires recipients to maintain records of ''each sexual harassment investigation.'' Any record that the recipient creates to investigate an allegation, regardless of later dismissal or other resolution of the allegation, must be maintained for seven years. Therefore, recipients must preserve all records, even those records from truncated investigations that led to no adjudication because the acts alleged did not constitute sex discrimination under Title IX and the formal complaint (or allegation therein) was dismissed. The Department also wishes to clarify that the date of the record's creation begins the seven year retention period. We reiterate that recipients may choose to keep each record for longer than seven years, for example to ensure that all records that form part of a ''file'' representing a particular Title IX sexual harassment case are retained for at least seven years from the date of creation of the last record pertaining to that case.

Regarding the Freedom of Information Act (FOIA),[1523] and similar State laws that require public disclosure of certain records, the Department cannot opine on whether disclosure of records required to be retained under the final regulations would, or would not, be required under FOIA or similar laws because such determinations require fact-specific analysis.

Additionally, as explained in the ''Section 106.6(e) FERPA'' subsection of the ''Clarifying Amendments to Existing Regulations'' section of this preamble, these final regulations, including § 106.45(b)(10)(i), do not run afoul of FERPA and to the extent possible, should be interpreted consistently with a recipient's obligations under FERPA. To address any concerns, the Department has removed the phrase ''make available to the complainant and respondent'' in § 106.45(b)(10) out of an abundance of caution and in case this phrase may have created confusion. Accordingly, the requirement to maintain records is separate and apart from the right to inspect and review these records under FERPA, and these final regulations specifically address when the parties must have an opportunity to inspect and review records relating to the party's particular case. For example, § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) requires that the recipient provide both parties an equal opportunity to inspect and review any evidence obtained as part of the investigation that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint. The Department acknowledges that a parent of a student or an eligible student may have the right to inspect and review their education records pursuant to 34 CFR 99.10 through 34 CFR 99.12, and these final regulations do not diminish these rights. As previously explained, FERPA allows a recipient to share information with the parties that is directly related to both parties.[1524] Further, § 106.71 authorizes any party who has suffered retaliation to alert the recipient by filing a complaint according to the prompt and equitable grievance procedures for sex discrimination required to be adopted under § 106.8(c).[1525]

In response to numerous commenters who requested the requirement to publish training materials, the Department agrees with commenters that such publication will improve the overall transparency and integrity of the Title IX grievance process, and thus revises § 106.45(b)(10) to require recipients to publish on their websites training materials referenced in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii). The Department believes the seven-year requirement will not significantly burden recipients, for whom keeping and publishing materials relevant to training its employees is good practice in light of the numerous lawsuits recipients have faced over handling of Title IX allegations. Regarding the request to clarify that recipients need only update published training materials when the recipient makes material changes to the materials,

[1524] 73 FR 74806, 74832–33 (Dec. 9, 2008).

[1525] The Department notes that other laws and regulations may require disclosure of recipient records to the Department, for instance when the Department investigates allegations that a recipient has failed to comply with Title IX. E.g., 34 CFR 100.6 (addressing a recipient's obligation to permit the Department access to a recipient's records and other information to determine compliance with this part).

this provision requires the recipient to publish training materials which are up to date and reflect the latest training provided to Title IX personnel.

Although we acknowledge that creating and storing records uses some resources, publishing training materials on a website and retaining the notes, reports, and audio or audiovisual recordings or transcripts from an investigation and any hearing are not cost prohibitive. The Department believes the recordkeeping requirements are practical and reasonable. To the extent that commenters' concerns that a recipient may be unable to publicize its training materials because some recipients hire outside consultants to provide training, the materials for which may be owned by the outside consultant and not by the recipient itself, the Department acknowledges that a recipient in that situation would need to secure permission from the consultant to publish the training materials, or alternatively, the recipient could create its own training materials over which the recipient has ownership and control.

The Department disagrees that it is ''impossible'' to know what training records recipients should maintain. Section 106.45(b)(1)(iii) specifies that recipients must train Title IX Coordinators, investigators, decision-makers, and persons who facilitate informal resolutions on specific topics for specific purposes, providing sufficient basis for a recipient to understand its obligations regarding retention and publication of materials used to conduct such training.

The Department does not wish to burden recipients with a requirement to send the records it maintains under this provision to the parties. However, parties preparing for a lawsuit or for an OCR complaint are entitled to receive copies of the evidence directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint,[1526] the investigative report,[1527] and the written determination regarding responsibility,[1528] and thus parties to a Title IX grievance process have relevant information that they may desire to review or submit as part of a school-level appeal, a lawsuit, or an OCR complaint.

The Department declines to require the data collections requested by commenters concerning Title IX reports and formal complaints. The Department wishes to correct a lack of due process and neutrality in the grievance process, among numerous other problems that occurred under previous Title IX guidance, and believes that prescribing a consistent framework for recipient responses to sexual harassment will benefit all individuals involved in reports and formal complaints of sexual harassment without regard to demographics. The Department notes that nothing in the final regulations precludes a recipient from collecting demographic data relating to the recipient's Title IX reports and formal complaints. Additionally, the Department does not believe that the concept of ''sealing'' records applies in the context of most educational institutions, nor does the Department believe that furthering the purposes of Title IX requires the Department to micromanage the manner in which recipients keep records. Recipients will maintain records of their Title IX investigations aimed at determining a respondent either responsible or not responsible; the Department does not believe that a recipient's retention of such records is the equivalent of keeping records of criminal juvenile delinquency.

The Department disagrees that the provision in § 106.45(b)(10)(ii) requiring a recipient to document the recipient's conclusion that its response to sexual harassment was not deliberately indifferent is useless. Although commenters may correctly assert that recipients ''of course'' believe their responses have been sufficient, requiring a recipient to document reasons for that conclusion requires the recipient to evaluate how it has handled any report or formal complaint of sexual harassment, documenting reasons why the recipient's response has not been clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances. For example, if a Title IX Coordinator decides to sign a formal complaint against the wishes of a complainant, the recipient should document the reasons why such a decision was not clearly unreasonable and how the recipient believes that it met its responsibility to provide that complainant with a non-deliberately indifferent response. To reinforce the obligation imposed on recipients to offer supportive measures (and engage in an interactive discussion with the complainant about appropriate, available supportive measures) in revised § 106.44(a), we have revised § 106.45(b)(10)(ii) to add that if a recipient does not provide a complainant with supportive measures, then the recipient must document the reasons why such a response was not clearly unreasonable in light of the known circumstances; for example, where a complainant refuses supportive measures or refuses to communicate with the Title IX Coordinator in order to know of supportive measures the recipient is offering. The Department declines to remove the final sentence of § 106.45(b)(10)(ii) because assuring a recipient that the recipient may provide additional documentation or explanations about the recipient's responses to sexual harassment after creating its initial records does not foreclose the ability of a court or administrative agency investigating a recipient's Title IX compliance to question the accuracy of a recipient's later-added documentation or explanations, and where such a court or agency is satisfied that later-added information was not, for example, fabricated to protect the recipient from exposure to liability, the later-added information helps such a court or agency accurately assess the recipient's response to sexual harassment.

The Department wishes to clarify that, unless ombudspersons have created records that the Department requires the recipient to maintain or publish, ombudspersons do not fall under § 106.45(b)(10). The provision identifies the type of record that must be kept, not the category of persons whose records do or do not fall under this provision.

Changes: The Department has removed from § 106.45(b)(10)(i) the word ''create'' and the phrase ''make available to the complainant and respondent.'' The Department has also revised the requirement to maintain records from three years to seven years. In § 106.45(b)(10)(i)(A), the Department has added ''Title IX'' to ''Coordinator'' and added any audio or audiovisual recording or transcript of a live hearing to the list of records required to be kept. We have revised § 106.45(b)(10)(i)(D) to add persons who facilitate informal resolutions to the list of Title IX personnel, and direct recipients to make materials used to train Title IX personnel available on the recipient's website or if the recipient does not have a website then such training materials must be available for public inspection. We have revised § 106.45(b)(10)(ii) to add the introductory clause ''For each response required under § 106.44(a) . . .'' and by increasing the retention period from three years to seven years. We have further revised § 106.45(b)(10)(ii) by replacing ''was not clearly unreasonable'' with ''was not deliberately indifferent'' and by adding that if a recipient does not provide a complainant with supportive measures, then the recipient must document the reasons why such a response was not

Clarifying Amendments to Existing Regulations

Section 106.3(a) Remedial Action

Comments: One commenter stated favorably that § 106.3(a) expands the remedial power of the Assistant Secretary in some cases, such as where a regulatory requirement has been violated, but where no sex discrimination has occurred. The commenter asserted that this is important for students who are deprived of due process in a Title IX proceeding.

Some commenters expressed concern that § 106.3(a) allows the Assistant Secretary to require a school to remedy any violation of the Title IX regulations, as opposed to only violations that constitute sex discrimination. Commenters argued that this will inappropriately shift the Department toward focusing on procedural requirements which will result in more complaints being filed with OCR that do not involve actual sex discrimination but only involve regulatory violations, and that this will unjustifiably expand the Department's jurisdiction over complaints brought by parties who were the respondents in underlying Title IX sexual harassment proceedings.

Discussion: The Department believes that the final regulations appropriately state that the Assistant Secretary may require recipients to remedy violations of Title IX regulations, even where the violation does not itself constitute sex discrimination. The Department, recipients, and the Supreme Court have long recognized the Department's statutory authority under 20 U.S.C. 1682 to promulgate rules to effectuate the purposes of Title IX even when regulatory requirements do not, themselves, purport to represent a definition of discrimination.[1529] In these final regulations, we revise § 106.3(a) to reflect the Department's statutory authority and longstanding Department practice with respect to requiring recipients to remedy violations both in the form of sex discrimination and other violations of our Title IX implementing regulations, including where the violation does not, itself, constitute sex discrimination. We emphasize that the Department's remedial powers are not intended to benefit only respondents; rather, any party can request that the Department take action against a recipient that has not complied with Title IX implementing regulations, including these final regulations. For example, if a recipient fails to offer supportive measures to a complaint pursuant to § 106.44(a), or fails to send written notice after dismissing a complainant's allegations under § 106.45(b)(3), the recipient is in violation of these final regulations and the Department may require the recipient to take remedial action.

Changes: We have revised § 106.3(a) to clarify that the Department may require a recipient to take remedial action for discriminating in violation of Title IX or for violating Title IX implementing regulations. We have removed the reference in the proposed regulations to assessment of damages and instead state that remedial action must be consistent with the Title IX statute, 20 U.S.C. 1682.

Comments: Commenters argued that proposed § 106.3(a) was unclear because the line between equitable remedies and monetary damages is sometimes unclear. Commenters asserted that proposed § 106.3(a) left open too many questions and would lead to confusion for students who file Title IX complaints with OCR. Another commenter suggested that the final regulations should unambiguously clarify that a complainant may always bring a Title IX claim in a private right of action.

Discussion: The Department agrees that the line between equitable and monetary relief may be difficult to discern, and is persuaded that attempting to distinguish between damages and equitable relief may cause confusion for students and for recipients. The current regulatory provision at 34 CFR 106.3(a) does not distinguish among various types of remedial action the Department might require of recipients, and the Supreme Court has noted that the current regulations ''do not appear to contemplate a condition ordering payment of monetary damages,'' but the Supreme Court did not indicate what types of remedial action might be contemplated under 20 U.S.C. 1682.[1530] In response to commenters' concerns that proposed § 106.3(a) would cause confusion, we have revised § 106.3(a) in these final regulations to remove the proposed reference to ''assessment of damages'' and instead indicate that the Department's remedial authority is consistent with 20 U.S.C. 1682.

While the Supreme Court has recognized a judicially implied right of private action under Title IX,[1531] these final regulations pertain to how the Department administratively enforces Title IX, and we therefore decline to reference private Title IX rights of action in these regulations implementing Title IX.

Changes: We have revised § 106.3(a) to clarify that the Department may require a recipient to take remedial action for discriminating in violation of Title IX or for violating Title IX implementing regulations. We have removed the reference to assessment of damages and instead state that remedial action must be consistent with the Title IX statute at 20 U.S.C. 1682.

Comments: Some commenters suggested that monetary damages ought to be available to complainants through the administrative enforcement process, particularly where there is no other means of remedying the sexual harassment that occurred. Commenters argued that damages ought to include damages for pain and suffering caused by a school's deliberate indifference. According to these commenters, depriving a complainant of a damages remedy will leave the complainant—even one who has established a bona fide Title IX violation—less than completely whole. Victims of sexual harassment, stated commenters, might miss work, might incur legal fees, might pay out-of-pocket for treatment expenses, or incur other monetary losses. Some commenters asserted that OCR ought to be able to award damages in cases where monetary relief is necessary to restore a complainant's position.

Discussion: The Department believes that remedial action should be carefully crafted to restore a victim's equal access to education and ensure that a recipient comes into compliance with Title IX and its implementing regulations. This approach has been cited approvingly by [1529] E.g., Gebser v. Lago Vista Indep. Sch. Dist., 524 U.S. 274, 291–92 (1998) (refusing to allow plaintiff to pursue a claim under Title IX based on the school's failure to comply with the Department's regulatory requirement to adopt and publish prompt and equitable grievance procedures, stating ''And in any event, the failure to promulgate a grievance procedure does not itself constitute 'discrimination' under Title IX. Of course, the Department of Education could enforce the requirement administratively: Agencies generally have authority to promulgate and enforce requirements that effectuate the statute's non-discrimination mandate, 20 U.S.C. 1682, even if those requirements do not purport to represent a definition of discrimination under the statute.'').

[1530] Gebser, 524 U.S. at 288–89 (''While agencies have conditioned continued funding on providing equitable relief to the victim, the regulations do not appear to contemplate a condition ordering payment of monetary damages, and there is no indication that payment of damages has been demanded as a condition of finding a recipient to be in compliance with the statute.'') (internal citation omitted).

the Supreme Court.[1532] The Department's revisions to § 106.3(a) ensure that the Department may exercise its administrative enforcement authority to fulfill these goals by requiring remedies consistent with 20 U.S.C. 1682, regardless of whether the remedies are deemed necessary due to a recipient's discrimination under Title IX or a recipient's violation of Department regulations implementing Title IX.[1533]

Changes: We have revised § 106.3(a) to clarify that the Department may require a recipient to take remedial action for discriminating in violation of Title IX or for violating Title IX implementing regulations. We have removed the reference to assessment of damages and instead state that remedial action must be consistent with the Title IX statute at 20 U.S.C. 1682.

Comments: Some commenters stated that proposed § 106.3(a) inappropriately narrowed the remedies available for sexual harassment, and that any effort to take rights away from victims was troubling. These commenters asserted that the Department ought to be using its power to expand protections for victims, not narrow them. Some commenters stated that preventing OCR from awarding monetary damages would reduce the incentive to report sex discrimination, meaning that it was more likely to continue unabated. Other commenters argued that monetary damages serve as an effective deterrent to a school not taking sex discrimination allegations seriously. One commenter asserted that this was part of a nefarious motive on the part of Secretary Betsy DeVos to hurt victims of discrimination, and not an effort to help the American people.

Discussion: The Department's purpose and motive in these final regulations is to implement legally binding obligations governing recipients' responses to sexual harassment so that recipients respond supportively to complainants and fairly to both complainants and respondents and operate education programs and activities free from sex discrimination, including in the form of sexual harassment. The Department intends to continue vigorously enforcing recipients' Title IX obligations. We are persuaded by commenters that specifying the type of remedies that OCR may require of recipients in administrative enforcement risks confusion for students, employees, and recipients, including as to whether the Department intends to continue vigorously enforcing recipients' Title IX obligations. We have therefore revised § 106.3(a) to clarify that the Department may require a recipient to take remedial action, consistent with the Department's regulatory authority under 20 U.S.C. 1682, whenever a recipient has discriminated in violation of Title IX or whenever a recipient has violated the Department's regulations implementing Title IX.

Changes: We have revised § 106.3(a) to clarify that the Department may require a recipient to take remedial action for discriminating in violation of Title IX or for violating Title IX implementing regulations. We have removed the reference to assessment of damages and instead state that remedial action must be consistent with the Title IX statute at 20 U.S.C. 1682.

Comments: Some commenters asserted that the withdrawal of all Federal funds happens so rarely that the payment of monetary damages is the only true way to get at a school's pocketbook for ignoring sex discrimination. Commenters argued that some schools will read § 106.3(a) too broadly, and deny even equitable relief to complainants, who then may never file with OCR and will simply be denied relief to which they are entitled. One commenter suggested that the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission has made public statements adopting the viewpoint that the best way to ensure compliance with non-discrimination law is to make employers pay damages for violating those laws. Commenters stated that if monetary damages cannot be a part of a resolution agreement, this would have the effect of increasing and encouraging sexual assault. It would also mean, commenters argued, that complainants could not obtain necessary treatment to respond to their trauma from the very misconduct that the recipient caused or exacerbated.

Discussion: The Department acknowledges that the termination of Federal financial assistance is rare, but this is because the statutory enforcement scheme that Congress set forth in 20 U.S.C. 1682 recognized termination of Federal funds as a ''severe'' remedy that should serve as a ''last resort'' when other, less severe measures have failed.[1534] Loss of Federal funding to a school district, college, or university is a serious consequence that may have devastating results for a recipient and the educational community the recipient exists to serve.[1535] Termination of Federal funds as a remedy is statutorily intended to serve as a ''last resort'' in order to ''avoid diverting education funding from beneficial uses'' unless that severe remedy is necessary.[1536] The fact that the severe remedy of terminating Federal funds is appropriately intended and utilized as a last resort does not preclude the Department from effectively enforcing Title IX by securing voluntary resolution agreements with recipients who have violated Title IX or its [1533] The Title IX statute at 20 U.S.C. 1682 provides in relevant part that any agency that disburses Federal financial assistance to a recipient is ''authorized and directed to effectuate the provisions of section 1681 of this title [i.e., Title IX's non-discrimination mandate] with respect to such program or activity by issuing rules, regulations, or orders of general applicability which shall be consistent with achievement of the objectives of the statute authorizing the financial assistance in connection with which the action is taken. . . . Compliance with any requirement adopted pursuant to this section may be effected (1) by the termination of or refusal to grant or to continue assistance under such program or activity to any recipient as to whom there has been an express finding on the record, after opportunity for hearing, of a failure to comply with such requirement, . . . or (2) by any other means authorized by law: Provided, however, That no such action shall be taken until the department or agency concerned has advised the appropriate person or persons of the failure to comply with the requirement and has determined that compliance cannot be secured by voluntary means.''

[1535] ''Federal financial assistance'' includes, for example, ''scholarships, loans, grants, wages or other funds extended to any entity for payment to or on behalf of students admitted to that entity, or extended directly to such students for payment to that entity.'' 34 CFR 106.4(g)(1)(ii); see also Pamela W. Kernie, Protecting Individuals from Sex Discrimination: Compensatory Relief Under Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, 67 Wash. L. Rev. 155, 166 (1992) (''Indeed, the fund-termination remedy, if applied, might actually prove detrimental to the very people Title IX is designed to protect: if an educational program's funds are terminated, future participants in the program will be denied the benefits of much-needed federal financial assistance.'').

[1536] Gebser, 524 U.S. at 289 (''Presumably, a central purpose of requiring notice of the violation to the appropriate person and an opportunity for voluntary compliance before administrative enforcement proceedings [to terminate Federal funding] can commence is to avoid diverting education funding from beneficial uses where a recipient was unaware of discrimination in its programs and is willing to institute prompt corrective measures.'').

implementing regulations.[1537] The Department will continue to effectively enforce Title IX, including these final regulations, in furtherance of Title IX's non-discrimination mandate.

The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission enforces non-discrimination laws, including Title VII, that provide specific limits on the amount of compensatory and punitive damages that a person can recover. For example, Title VII expressly limits the amount of compensatory and punitive damages that a person may recover against an employer with more than 500 employees to $300,000, in 20 U.S.C. 1981a(b)(3)(D). Title IX, unlike Title VII, does not expressly include any reference to such compensatory and punitive damages, nor does any statute address the amount of compensatory and punitive damages that may be awarded under Title IX. Instead, Congress expressly references an agency's suspension or termination of Federal financial assistance, which is a severe consequence, and also allows a recipient to secure compliance with its regulations through any ''other means authorized by law''. The Department will therefore continue to enforce Title IX consistent with 20 U.S.C. 1682, and not by reference to the enforcement schemes set forth in other laws. Remedial action required of a recipient for violating Title IX or these final regulations may therefore include any action consistent with 20 U.S.C. 1682, and may include equitable and injunctive actions as well as financial compensation to victims of discrimination or regulatory violations, as necessary under the specific facts of a case.[1538]

Changes: We have revised § 106.3(a) to clarify that the Department may require a recipient to take remedial action for discriminating in violation of Title IX or for violating Title IX implementing regulations. We have removed the reference to assessment of damages and instead state that remedial action must be consistent with the Title IX statute at 20 U.S.C. 1682.

Comments: Some commenters asserted that proposed § 106.3(a) was inconsistent with the statutory provisions of Title IX, since Title IX does not limit the types of relief that OCR may provide to complainants. Other commenters stated that the proposed rules would shift existing policy away from how Congress and the agency have interpreted the current regulatory provisions for the past 50 years, arguing that Title VI contains an express limit on relief, allowing only ''preventive relief'' under 42 U.S.C. 2000a–3 while Title IX does not contain such limiting language in its remedial provisions, at 20 U.S.C. 1682, which allows for relief by ''any other means authorized by law''. Commenters referred to resolution agreements where OCR has seemingly awarded monetary damages remedies.

Discussion: As discussed above, the Department is persuaded by commenters' concerns that because Title IX, 20 U.S.C. 1682, does not expressly approve or disapprove of monetary damages as one of the ''other means authorized by law'' which the Department may use to secure compliance under the Department's administrative enforcement authority, the Department should not differentiate in § 106.3(a) among potential remedies that may be deemed necessary to ensure that a recipient complies with Title IX and its implementing regulations. We have revised § 106.3(a) to expressly provide that discrimination under Title IX, or violations of the Department's Title IX regulations, may require a recipient to take remedial action, and that such remedial action ordered by the Department in an enforcement action must be consistent with 20 U.S.C. 1682. The Department notes that actions that some commenters characterize as OCR requiring a recipient to pay ''monetary damages'' may be viewed as financial compensation that OCR requires a recipient to pay to a victim of sex discrimination as a form of equitable relief, which does not necessarily constitute ''monetary damages.'' However, the revisions to § 106.3(a) affirm that the Department will continue to enforce Title IX and its implementing regulations vigorously by using all tools at the Department's disposal under 20 U.S.C. 1682.

Changes: We have revised § 106.3(a) to clarify that the Department may require a recipient to take remedial action for discriminating in violation of Title IX or for violating Title IX implementing regulations. We have removed the reference to assessment of damages and instead state that remedial action must be consistent with the Title IX statute at 20 U.S.C. 1682.

Comments: Some commenters stated that the proposed rules' reliance on Supreme Court case law is faulty, because those cases arose in the context of private rights of action in civil suits, and not the administrative context. Another commenter stated that OCR already does not award monetary damages, and so § 106.3 is unnecessary, but could engender confusion, particularly where equitable remedies involving monetary payments are necessary to make a complainant whole. Another commenter asserted that there is a discord between changing the legal standards in other parts of the proposed rules to more closely mirror the legal standards in civil suits, while expressly barring complainants from obtaining the relief that they would otherwise be entitled to in civil suits.

Discussion: The Department is persuaded by commenters' concerns that proposed § 106.3(a) may have had the unintended effect, or perceived effect, of restricting the Department's ability to vigorously enforce Title IX through all ''means authorized by law,''[1539] may have caused unnecessary confusion on topics such as whether the Department's administrative enforcement of Title IX pursues the same goals as private lawsuits under Title IX (i.e., enforcement of Title IX's non-discrimination mandate), whether financial compensation when necessary to remedy a recipient's discrimination against individual victims would no longer be part of the Department's enforcement efforts, and may have indicated tension with the Department's approach to adopting and adapting the three-part Gebser/Davis framework[1540] (which the Supreme Court developed in the context of private litigation subjecting schools to monetary damages). To address commenters' concerns and clarify the Department's intent to vigorously enforce Title IX, we have revised § 106.3(a) to state that the Department may order remedial action as necessary to correct discrimination [1537] Catharine A. MacKinnon, In Their Hands: Restoring Institutional Liability for Sexual Harassment in Education, 125 Yale L. J. 2038, fn. 102 (2016) (noting that the fact that OCR has not actually terminated a school's Federal funds ''only means schools, knowing OCR means business, have complied, not that OCR is unwilling to use this tool.'').

under Title IX or violations of the Department's Title IX regulations, consistent with 20 U.S.C. 1682.

Changes: We have revised § 106.3(a) to clarify that the Department may require a recipient to take remedial action for discriminating in violation of Title IX or for violating Title IX implementing regulations. We have removed the reference to assessment of damages and instead state that remedial action must be consistent with the Title IX statute at 20 U.S.C. 1682.

Comments: Commenters stated that because the current regulations need clarity and modification, it is good that the proposed rules addressed the remedies issue. Some commenters stated that the proposed rules set forth a fair and reliable procedure with respect to damages and remedies. Commenters who worked for postsecondary institutions expressed support for proposed § 106.3(a) as a significant improvement upon the current Title IX landscape. Some commenters on behalf of institutions expressed appreciation for the focus on remedial action that does not include the assessment of damages against a recipient because some recipients are small, rural schools with limited resources, and would prefer to use those resources to remedy violations rather than pay damages. Commenters asserted that proposed § 106.3(a) helps recipient institutions avoid unnecessary burdens. Commenters stated that they supported the limitation of remedial action to exclude assessment of damages against the recipient because parties seeking monetary damages may always avail themselves of the courts, which are better equipped than OCR to assess damages to compensate a victim for harms like emotional distress. One commenter asserted that proposed § 106.3(a) would appropriately focus Title IX enforcement on securing equitable relief and bringing schools into compliance with Title IX. Commenters offered that it is appropriate for OCR to focus exclusively on equitable relief and bringing schools into compliance, as opposed to compensating victims.

Discussion: The Department appreciates some commenters' support for the intention of proposed § 106.3(a), to distinguish between monetary damages and equitable relief in determining remedial action the Department should pursue in its administrative enforcement actions. However, for the reasons discussed above, the Department is persuaded by the concerns of other commenters and we have revised § 106.3(a) to remove reference to assessment of damages.

Changes: We have revised § 106.3(a) to clarify that the Department may require a recipient to take remedial action for discriminating in violation of Title IX or for violating Title IX implementing regulations. We have removed the reference to assessment of damages and instead state that remedial action must be consistent with the Title IX statute at 20 U.S.C. 1682.

Comments: Some commenters argued that proposed § 106.3(a) conveyed that the Department will not be enforcing Title IX at all and will look the other way at a recipient's failure to respond to allegations of sexual harassment. Another commenter suggested that the proposed rules ought to state that all remedial action should be dedicated to minimizing, to the extent possible, harm done to the complainant. One commenter argued that proposed § 106.3 would create an inconsistency with other laws and regulations that OCR enforces, such as Title VI or Section 504.

One commenter argued that § 106.3(a) is a change in position from prior Department guidance that contemplates monetary relief, is in tension with a Department of Justice manual about Title IX,[1541] and could potentially put the Department's Title IX enforcement practices in tension with other executive branch agencies that enforce Title IX. The commenter asserted that it is strange for a complainant's scope of relief to change depending on the agency with which the complaint is filed. The commenter asserted that such a significant shift ought to be more fulsomely explained by the Department. Additionally, the commenter stated that the commenter had filed a Freedom of Information Act (FOIA) request but had not yet received a response, and that the proposed rules ought to be withdrawn until the commenter had opportunity to review the FOIA response and comment further. The same commenter argued that the proposed rules would pose anomalous situations that would strain OCR's ability to separate equitable relief involving payments of money, from non-equitable relief in the form of monetary damages. The commenter raised the scenario of a complainant that suffers damages caused by a third party; in the hypothetical, a student is sexually harassed at their school and reports the incident, and later the student obtains a scholarship at another school, and if the first school retaliates against the reporting student by interfering with the scholarship so the student loses the scholarship, the first school may or may not be liable for the loss of the scholarship under revised § 106.3(a), depending on whether OCR construes that relief as monetary damages or equitable relief.

Discussion: For reasons discussed above, the Department is persuaded by commenters' concerns that proposed § 106.3(a) could cause unnecessary confusion, such as about how the Department intends to enforce Title IX and whether the Department intends to continue vigorously enforcing Title IX administratively. We have revised § 106.3(a) to clarify that the Department will require remedial action for a recipient's discrimination under Title IX or a recipient's violations of Title IX regulations, in a manner consistent with 20 U.S.C. 1682. In light of these revisions, the Department does not believe it is necessary to analyze prior Department guidance as to whether the Department's past practice has, or has not, been to impose monetary damages for Title IX violations, and for similar reasons there is no conflict between § 106.3(a) in the final regulations, and the Department of Justice Title IX Manual referenced by commenters, or among the Department's approach to remedial action and the approach of other Federal agencies, each of which is subject to the same provision in the Title IX statute (20 U.S.C. 1682) regarding administrative enforcement of Title IX, to which § 106.3(a) now refers. We note that the sufficiency of the Department's response to any individual FOIA request is beyond the scope of this rulemaking, and decline to comment on the content of such a request or its relationship to these final regulations. The revisions to § 106.3(a) additionally ameliorate the commenter's concern raised in a hypothetical, that a dividing line between equitable relief and monetary damages could lead to the Department being constrained from requiring a recipient to, for example, reimburse a student for the value of a lost scholarship under circumstances where such remedial action is necessary to remediate the effects of a recipient's discrimination against an individual student.

Changes: We have revised § 106.3(a) to clarify that the Department may require a recipient to take remedial action for discriminating in violation of Title IX or for violating Title IX implementing regulations. We have removed the reference to assessment of damages and instead state that remedial action must be consistent with the Title IX statute at 20 U.S.C. 1682.

[1541] Commenters cited: U.S. Dep't. of Justice, Title IX Legal Manual ''VIII Private Right of Action and Individual Relief through Agency Action, C. Recommendations for Agency Action.''

Comments: Some commenters suggested that if changes to § 106.3 are made at all, the changes ought to strengthen the penalties that can be adjudicated against actual perpetrators of sexual harassment, including students. One commenter suggested that students who engage in sexual harassment ought to themselves be liable for monetary damages as part of OCR's enforcement practices. Additionally, this commenter argued that OCR ought to make students who engage in sexual harassment repay grants given to them by the Federal government, and permanently bar such students from applying for any financial assistance in the future. Another commenter suggested that the Department ought to bar students who commit sexual harassment from attending any other postsecondary institution in the future.

Discussion: Title IX applies to recipients of Federal financial assistance operating education programs or activities.[1542] Title IX does not apply as a direct bar against perpetration of sexual harassment by individual respondents; rather, Title IX requires recipients to operate education programs and activities free from sex discrimination. When a recipient knowingly, deliberately refuses to respond to sexual harassment, such response is a violation of Title IX's non-discrimination mandate, and a recipient's failure to respond appropriately in other ways mandated by these final regulations constitutes a violation of the Department's regulations implementing Title IX.[1543] The Department will vigorously enforce Title IX's non-discrimination mandate and the obligations contained in these final regulations to ensure recipients' compliance.

These final regulations clarify the conditions that trigger a recipient's legal obligations with respect to sexual harassment and enforcement of Title IX, and these final regulations are focused on remedial actions the recipient must take, rather than on punitive actions against individuals who perpetrate sexual harassment.[1544] These final regulations explain the circumstances under which a recipient must provide remedies to victims of sexual harassment, and leave decisions about appropriate disciplinary sanctions imposed on respondents found responsible for sexual harassment within the sound discretion of the recipient.[1545] These final regulations do not impact eligibility of a student for Federal student aid or the eligibility of an individual to apply for Federal grants. The Title IX statute authorizes the Department to enforce Title IX by terminating Federal financial assistance provided to a recipient operating education programs or activities—not by terminating Federal financial aid to individual students. As discussed previously, these final regulations leave sanctions and punitive consequences that a recipient chooses to take against a respondent found responsible for sexual harassment in the sound discretion of the recipient. Nothing in these final regulations precludes a recipient from barring such a respondent found responsible for sexual harassment from continuing enrollment or from re-enrolling with the recipient, or from including a notation on the student's transcript with the intent or effect of prohibiting the respondent from future enrollment with a different recipient.[1546]

Changes: We have revised § 106.3(a) to clarify that the Department may require a recipient to take remedial action for discriminating in violation of Title IX or for violating Title IX implementing regulations. We have removed the reference to assessment of damages and instead state that remedial action must be consistent with the Title IX statute at 20 U.S.C. 1682.

Comments: Some commenters asserted that the proposed rules ought to eliminate the ability of a recipient to engage in affirmative action absent any finding of a violation; commenters referenced a provision under 34 CFR 106.3(b) that the proposed rules did not propose to alter. Additionally, some commenters stated that the proposed rules ought to more clearly define what monetary damages are, since monetary payments may nevertheless be equitable in nature, in some circumstances. Commenters suggested that the Assistant Secretary for Civil Rights ought to be more constrained in assessment of remedies than proposed § 106.3(a) set forth and should not require that schools engage in disciplinary or exclusionary processes in order to remedy sexual harassment. Commenters argued that the Assistant Secretary should only have jurisdiction to require supportive measures for victims of sexual harassment in order to restore access to education and bring a recipient into compliance with Title IX.

Discussion: In the NPRM, the Department proposed revisions to § 106.3(a), which concerns remedial action, and did not propose changing the provisions of 34 CFR 106.3(b), which concerns affirmative action, and the Department declines to revise 34 CFR 106.3(b) in these final regulations.

The Department disagrees that the Department lacks authority to require recipients to investigate and adjudicate sexual harassment allegations in order to determine whether remedies are necessary to restore or preserve the equal educational access of a victim of sexual harassment, including deciding whether disciplinary sanctions are warranted against a respondent found responsible for sexual harassment. Since 1975, Department regulations have required recipients to adopt and publish grievance procedures to address student and employee complaints of sex discrimination,[1547] and through guidance since 1997 the Department has interpreted this regulatory requirement to apply to complaints of sexual harassment. Adopting and publishing a grievance process to address sexual harassment as a form of sex discrimination prevents instances in which a recipient violates Title IX by failing to provide remedies to victims of sexual harassment, falling squarely within the Department's authority to promulgate rules that further Title IX's non-discrimination mandate.[1548] As previously discussed, with respect to disciplinary sanctions, the Department, like the courts, will ''refrain from second guessing the disciplinary decisions made by school administrators'' [1549] because school administrators are best positioned to determine the appropriate discipline to be imposed. The final regulations remove reference to ''assessment of damages'' in § 106.3(a), and thus the Department declines to provide a definition of ''monetary damages'' in order to clarify when payments of money are part of equitable relief, versus damages.

Changes: We have revised § 106.3(a) to clarify that the Department may require a recipient to take remedial action for discriminating in violation of Title IX or for violating Title IX implementing regulations. We have

Section 106.6(d)(1) First Amendment

Comments: A number of commenters expressed support for § 106.6(d) generally, including § 106.6(d)(1) regarding the First Amendment. Other commenters argued the provision is necessary to prevent a chilling effect on free speech. Other commenters supported this provision because they believed that Title IX should conform with Supreme Court rulings on free speech. Commenters argued that the protection of free speech on campuses is important and that this provision helps prevent Title IX enforcement from chilling free speech. Commenters argued that § 106.6(d) is necessary in light of the growing number of instances in which institutions have violated students' rights in campus Title IX adjudications. Commenters expressed support for the saving clause nature of this provision because of concerns that Title IX has a disproportionate impact on men of color and other disadvantaged demographic groups.

Some commenters requested more clarity on the application of the saving clause to specific situations. Commenters requested that OCR ''provide additional guidance or clarity on what responsibilities school districts have with respect to the First Amendment and other constitutional protections.'' One commenter requested guidance on the parameters of free speech protections. Other commenters supported the saving clause but requested that the Department modify the language to provide greater protection for free speech, such as providing explicit protection of academic freedom, or such as changing the provision to not just state that the regulations do not require a recipient to restrict constitutional rights, but that the regulations do not permit deprivations of constitutional rights. Some commenters expressed confusion as to whether the saving clauses in 106.6(d) cover recipients that are not government actors.

A number of commenters opposed the saving clause because they believed it is unnecessary.

One commenter opposed the saving clause due to the concern that it could be seen as calling for the courts to give greater weight to the listed constitutional protections than a court may have given otherwise. As an example, the commenter posed a hypothetical case where First Amendment rights are implicated; without the addition of § 106.6(d)(1), a court could give different weight to factors in its factored-analysis as to whether a constitutional violation occurred but with the saving clause in the proposed rules, the court may conclude that the Department has determined that greater weight should be given to First Amendment protections than the other factors used in its making of a determination of a constitutional violation.

One commenter argued that the saving clause is an unwarranted and harmful restriction on Title IX. The commenter reasoned that under Title IX's non-discrimination mandate the Department could, for example, reasonably determine that Title IX requires that a trigger warning be given to students before the start of any academic class discussing topics involving sexual violations, so that students could avoid being subjected to the traumatizing class discussion; the commenter argued that such a requirement is constitutional and could be necessary under Title IX, yet because of § 106.6(d) such a reasonable, constitutional requirement (because even First Amendment speech rights are not unlimited, inasmuch as yelling ''fire'' in a crowded theater has long been deemed unprotected speech) to promote Title IX's purposes might be forgone by the Department. On the other hand, another commenter argued that classroom discussions about sensitive topics involving sex and sexuality are protected by academic freedom—in the teacher or professor's judgment—even if such topics are offensive and uncomfortable to some students.

Discussion: The Department added § 106.6(d)(1) to act as a saving clause.[1550] Its purpose is to ensure the Department is promoting non-discrimination enforcement consistent with constitutional protections, and with First Amendment protections of free speech and academic freedom in particular. Due to significant confusion regarding the intersection of individuals' rights under the U.S. Constitution with a recipient's obligations under Title IX, the proposed regulations clarify that these regulations do not require a recipient to infringe upon any individual's rights protected under the First Amendment.

The Department disagrees with the commenter who argued that § 106.6(d)(1) will chill Title IX enforcement without more precise language. Rather, stating that nothing in regulations implementing Title IX requires restriction of constitutional rights protects robust Title IX enforcement by clarifying that furthering Title IX's non-discrimination mandate does not conflict with constitutional protections. Failure to recognize and respect principles of free speech and academic freedom has led to overly broad anti-harassment policies that have resulted in chilling and infringement of constitutional protections.[1551]

The Department disagrees with commenters who argued that additional language or guidance is necessary in § 106.6(d)(1). We believe that § 106.6(d)(1) is clear without further explanation. The Department also includes an explanation of First Amendment law and the interaction of First Amendment law with these final regulations throughout the preamble; for example, in the ''Davis standard generally'' subsection of the ''Prong (2) Davis standard'' subsection of the ''Sexual Harassment'' subsection in the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section, the Department includes discussion about how the second prong of the definition of sexual harassment in § 106.30, with language from Davis, interacts with the First Amendment. The Department will abide by courts' rulings as to the scope of the First Amendment.

In response to requests from commenters for stronger First Amendment protections in these final regulations, the Department has added additional language in the final regulations, addressing circumstances under which First Amendment concerns often intersect with Title IX policies and procedures. For example, the Department has added § 106.71 (prohibiting retaliation) to state that the exercise of rights protected under the First Amendment does not constitute retaliation. The final regulations also add language in § 106.44(a) to state that the Department may not deem a recipient to have satisfied the recipient's duty to not be deliberately indifferent based on the recipient's restriction of rights protected under the U.S. Constitution, including the First Amendment. The Department reinforces § 106.6(d) in the context of a recipient's non-deliberately indifferent response in § 106.44(a) and evaluation of retaliation under new § 106.71 to caution recipients that the Department will not require a recipient to restrict constitutional rights as a method of Title IX compliance. Because academic freedom is well understood to be protected under the First Amendment, the Department declines to expressly reference ''academic freedom'' in § 106.6(d)(1), but that provision applies to all rights protected under the First Amendment.

Title IX, including § 106.6(d), applies to all recipients of Federal financial assistance, including private actors. The language is intended to clarify that, under Title IX regulations, recipients—including private recipients—are not obligated by Federal law under Title IX to restrict free speech or other rights that the Federal government could not restrict directly. Accordingly, the government may not compel private actors to restrict conduct that the government itself could not constitutionally restrict.[1552]

The Department agrees with commenters who stated that § 106.6(d)(1) will ensure that nothing in these final regulations is interpreted to violate the First Amendment to the U.S. Constitution, and we agree that this provision is important to prevent a chilling effect on free speech. As discussed in more detail in the ''Sexual Harassment'' subsection of the ''Section 106.30 Definitions'' section of this preamble, overly broad definitions applied in anti-harassment codes of conduct have led to confusion about how to enforce non-sex discrimination laws like Title IX consistent with First Amendment protections, and we therefore disagree that § 106.6(d)(1) is unnecessary.

The Department disagrees that § 106.6(d)(1) will change the way courts interpret the Constitution or Title IX. These types of clauses are routinely included in regulations to note similar issues, and we have no reason to believe including a saving clause such as § 106.6(d) would encourage courts to apply the Constitution differently or more broadly than they otherwise would. The Department believes that § 106.6(d)(1) acts as a saving clause to ensure that institutions do not violate the First Amendment's requirements, but the scope and meaning of First Amendment rights and protections are not affected by these final regulations.

The Department disagrees that these final regulations including § 106.6(d)(1), unnecessarily and harmfully prohibit the Department from promulgating regulations under Title IX that are constitutionally permissible. Contrary to the commenter's assertions, these final regulations clarify that part 106 of title 34 of the Code of Federal Regulations in no way requires the restriction of rights that would otherwise be protected from government action by the First Amendment. The U.S. Constitution applies to the Department as a Federal government agency, and the Department cannot enforce Title IX (e.g., interpret Title IX and promulgate rules enforcing the purposes of Title IX) in a manner that requires restricting constitutional rights protected from government action by the First Amendment. These final regulations neither require nor prohibit a recipient from providing a trigger warning prior to a classroom discussion about sexual harassment including sexual assault; § 106.6(d)(1) does assure students, employees (including teachers and professors), and recipients that ensuring non-discrimination on the basis of sex under Title IX does not require restricting rights of speech, expression, and academic freedom guaranteed by the First Amendment. Whether the recipient would like to provide such a trigger warning and offer alternate opportunities for those students fearing renewed trauma from participating in such a classroom discussion is within the recipient's discretion. However, nothing in § 106.6(d) restricts the Department from issuing any rule effectuating the purpose of Title IX that the Department would otherwise be permitted to issue; in other words, with or without § 106.6(d), the Department as a Federal government agency is required to abide by the First Amendment, and would not be permitted to issue a rule that restricts constitutional rights, whether or not a saving clause such as § 106.6(d) exists to remind recipients that Title IX enforcement never requires any recipient to restrict constitutional rights.

Changes: None.

Section 106.6(d)(2) Due Process

Comments: A number of commenters expressed general support for § 106.6(d)(2) and the protection of due process of law. Commenters supported the provision because they asserted that there is confusion now as to how Title IX affects individual rights, and that this provision provides clarity. Commenters supported this provision in light of actions of educational institutions that commenters believed have violated the constitutional rights of students in Title IX proceedings; some commenters asserted that due process deprivations were caused by policies implemented under the withdrawn 2011 Dear Colleague Letter.

Some commenters expressed confusion as to whether the saving clauses in § 106.6(d) cover recipients that are not government actors.

Commenters requested clarification of § 106.6(d)(2), asserting that the Department must comply with Executive Order 13563, which calls for regulations to reduce uncertainty and be written in plain language.

A number of commenters opposed § 106.6(d)(2). Commenters opposed the saving clause, arguing that it is unnecessary. Other commenters opposed this provision because they argued that it inappropriately pits Title IX's civil rights mandate against the Constitution, when no such conflict exists. Other commenters opposed this provision, asserting that schools are not courts of law.

Other commenters argued that § 106.6(d)(2) could be seen by the courts as calling for the courts to give greater weight to the listed constitutional protections than courts may give without this provision.

Other commenters opposed this provision stating that it would be burdensome on institutions.

Discussion: The Department added § 106.6(d)(2) to act as a saving clause. The Department included this provision to promote enforcement of Title IX's non-discrimination mandate consistent with constitutional protections.[1553] Due to significant confusion regarding the intersection of individuals' rights under the U.S. Constitution with a recipient's obligations under Title IX, the Department believes that this provision will help clarify that nothing in regulations implementing Title IX requires a recipient to infringe upon any individual's rights protected under the Due Process Clauses of the U.S. Constitution.

As noted previously, some commenters expressed confusion as to whether the saving clauses in § 106.6(d) cover recipients that are not government actors. The Department reiterates that Title IX, including § 106.6(d), applies to all recipients of Federal funding, including private actors. The language is intended to make clear that, under Title IX regulations, recipients—including private recipients—are not obligated to choose between complying with Title IX and respecting constitutional rights. Section 106.6(d)(2) clarifies that no recipient, including a private recipient, is required to take actions constituting deprivation of rights secured by the Constitution that the Federal government could not take directly. The government may not compel private actors to restrict conduct that the government itself could not constitutionally restrict.[1554]

The Department believes it has complied with Executive Order 13563 with respect to § 106.6(d)(2).[1555] We believe that this provision is clear, uses plain language, and is tailored to the objective of clarifying that nothing in these regulations requires a recipient to infringe upon any individual's rights protected under the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth or Fourteenth Amendments. We intend for § 106.6(d)(2) to reduce uncertainty about the interaction between these final regulations and recipients' due process obligations. The Department agrees with commenters who supported § 106.6(d)(2) as necessary to protect the constitutional rights of complainants and respondents in Title IX proceedings. The Department also disagrees that § 106.6(d)(2) pits Title IX's civil rights mandate against the Constitution; to the contrary, this provision helps clarify that there is no conflict between enforcement of Title IX and respect for constitutional rights.

The Department disagrees that § 106.6(d)(2) could be seen by the courts as calling for giving greater weight to the listed constitutional protections than courts may have otherwise given. These types of saving clauses are routinely included in regulations to note similar issues, and we have no reason to believe including one here would encourage courts to apply the Constitution differently or more broadly than they otherwise would. Nothing in these final regulations alters the meaning or scope of constitutional rights or protections, but rather acknowledges that whatever the meaning and scope of a constitutional right, that right never needs to be restricted to comply with Title IX regulations.

We agree that schools are not courts of law; however, the Due Process Clauses of the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments do not just apply in judicial proceedings. Constitutional protections such as the right to due process of law apply to the actions of governmental actors, including governmental decisions in administrative hearings which deprive individuals of liberty or property interests.[1556] For example, when a State university imposes a serious disciplinary sanction, it must comply with the terms of the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[1557] For private institutions receiving Federal financial assistance, the Department cannot require such institutions to deprive persons of rights protected under the U.S. Constitution in order to comply with these final regulations implementing Title IX.[1558]

Changes: None.

Section 106.6(d)(3) Other Constitutional Rights

Comments: A number of commenters expressed support for § 106.6(d)(3). One commenter who opposed the NPRM in general agreed with § 106.6(d)(3). Commenters supported § 106.6(d)(3) due to their own experiences with Title IX procedures and adjudications, stating that such processes lacked basic due process protections. Several commenters supported § 106.6(d)(3), asserting that constitutionally-guaranteed due process rights trump any guidance or requirements established under Title IX. Other commenters argued that the Department should add additional specific constitutional saving clauses, similar to § 106.6(d)(1)–(3), to protect individual liberty from government overreach, such as Sixth Amendment and Seventh Amendment protections.

Several commenters opposed § 106.6(d)(3). Commenters opposed § 106.6(d)(3) because they believed the provision is unnecessary. Some commenters opposed § 106.6(d)(3) asserting it was inapplicable to private institutions. Commenters opposed this provision asserting it would be burdensome for recipients. Commenters opposed this provision arguing that the provision implies that there has been past fault by institutions depriving constitutional rights. Commenters opposed this provision arguing that it could be seen by courts as calling for the courts to give greater weight to constitutional protections than a court may otherwise give.

Discussion: The purpose of § 106.6(d)(3) is to ensure that regulations implementing Title IX promote the non-discrimination mandate of Title IX consistent with all constitutional rights and protections. To avoid confusion regarding the intersection of individuals' rights under the U.S. Constitution, and a recipient's obligations under Title IX, § 106.6(d)(3) clarifies that nothing in regulations implementing Title IX requires a recipient to infringe upon any rights guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. This provision also makes it clear that, under Title IX regulations, recipients—including private recipients—are not obligated by Title IX to restrict rights that the Federal government could not restrict directly. Consistent with Supreme Court case law, the government may not compel private actors to restrict conduct that the government itself could not constitutionally restrict.[1559]

The Department agrees that constitutionally-guaranteed due process rights trump any guidance or requirements established by Title IX, and disagrees that § 106.6(d)(3) may be interpreted by courts to give greater weight to constitutional protections than a court may otherwise give. Congress authorized and directed the Department to promulgate regulations to effectuate Title IX.[1560] The Department, thus, has the authority to promulgate regulations that further Title IX's non-discrimination mandate, though such regulations must not require restriction of constitutional rights. Section 106.6(d)(3) states that position. Nothing in the final regulations alters the meaning or scope of constitutional rights or protections. Section 106.6(d)(3) is in the nature of a saving clause, and such clauses are routinely included in regulations to note similar issues; we have no reason to believe including one here would encourage courts to apply the Constitution differently or more broadly than courts otherwise would.

With respect to the suggestion to list additional constitutional rights specifically in § 106.6(d), the Department believes the concerns raised by the commenters are already sufficiently addressed by this provision, which covers ''any other rights guaranteed against government action by the U.S. Constitution'' and by § 106.6(d)(1)–(2) which specifically refer to constitutional rights that most often intersect with Title IX enforcement—First Amendment rights, and the right to due process of law.

The Department disagrees that this provision is unnecessary or burdensome. The Department's goal is to ensure that non-discrimination provisions are enforced in a manner that is consistent with the entire U.S. Constitution. Although the First Amendment and Due Process Clauses tend to be the most directly relevant provisions to these final regulations concerning responses to sexual harassment, the Department believes a catch-all saving clause regarding constitutional rights is necessary and appropriate. In addition, emphasizing and clarifying that these final regulations do not require a recipient to restrict rights, should not pose a burden.

We do not believe that inclusion of § 106.6(d)(3) in these final regulations implies ''fault'' on the part of particular recipients or indicates a belief regarding the extent to which recipients may, or may not, have regarded Title IX obligations as necessitating restriction of constitutional rights, but we believe that including this provision will help ensure that constitutional rights are properly respected in all efforts to enforce Title IX.

Changes: None.

Section 106.6(e) FERPA

Background

These final regulations, including § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) (giving the parties access to all evidence directly related to the allegations in the formal complaint) and § 106.45(b)(5)(iv) (allowing the parties to bring an advisor of choice to all meetings in the Title IX proceeding), help protect a party's, including an employee-respondent's, procedural due process rights under the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution. Procedural due process requires notice and a meaningful opportunity to respond.[1561] The Department is precluded from administering, enforcing, and interpreting statutes, including Title IX and FERPA, in a manner that would require a recipient to deny the parties, including employee-respondents, their constitutional right to due process because the Department, as an agency of the Federal government, is subject to the U.S. Constitution. The Department's position is consistent with the principle articulated in the Department's 2001 Guidance that the ''rights established under Title IX must be interpreted consistent with any federally guaranteed due process rights involved in a complaint proceeding.'' [1562]

The Department expressly stated in the 2001 Guidance that ''[FERPA] does not override federally protected due process rights of persons accused of sexual harassment'' in the context of public school employees or other recipients that are public entities, and the 2001 Guidance will continue to constitute the Department's interpretation of the intersection of Title IX and FERPA even after these final regulations become effective.[1563] The Department's NPRM addresses private schools and expressly states:

> We are proposing to add paragraph (d) to clarify that nothing in these regulations requires a recipient to infringe upon any individual's rights protected under the First Amendment or the Due Process Clauses, or [ ] any other rights guaranteed by the U.S. Constitution. The language also makes it clear that, under the Title IX regulations, recipients—including private recipients—are not obligated by Title IX to restrict speech or other behavior that the Federal government could not restrict directly. Consistent with Supreme Court case law, the government may not compel private actors to restrict conduct that the government itself could not constitutionally restrict. See e.g., Peterson v. City of Greenville, 373 U.S. 244 (1963); Truax v. Raich, 239 U.S. 33, 38 (1915). Thus, recipients that are private entities are not required by Title IX or its regulations to restrict speech or other behavior that would be protected against restriction by governmental entities.[1564]

The Department acknowledged in the NPRM that it cannot interpret Title IX to compel a private school to deprive employee-respondents of their due process rights, specifically the opportunity to review the evidence that directly relates to the allegations against that employee and to bring an advisor to help defend against the allegations. Similarly, the Department cannot interpret FERPA to compel a private school to apply the Department's Title IX regulations in a manner that deprives parties, including any respondent-employees, of due process. In Peterson v. City of Greenville, the U.S. Supreme Court held that the City of Greenville through an ordinance could not compel a private restaurant to operate in a manner that treated patrons differently on the basis of race in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[1565] Similarly, in Truax v. Raich, the Supreme Court held that Arizona cannot use a State statute to compel private entities to employ a specific percentage of native-born Americans as employees in violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.[1566] Like the City of Greenville and the State of Arizona, the Department cannot compel private schools that apply FERPA and Title IX, as interpreted by the Department, to violate a party's due process rights, including an employee's due process rights.

(The Department sometimes uses the terms ''alleged victim'' and ''alleged perpetrator'' in responding to comments about the intersection between Title IX and FERPA because FERPA, e.g., 20 U.S.C. 1232g(b)(6), and its implementing regulations, e.g., 34 CFR 99.31(a)(13)–(a)(14) and 34 CFR 99.39, use these specific terms.)

Comments, Discussion, and Changes

Comments: Some commenters commended the proposed rules for appropriately balancing Title IX protections with FERPA, suggesting that both are important laws but that in most cases, the proposed rules and FERPA can co-exist without conflict.

Some commenters argued that nothing in FERPA prevents parties from accessing information or evidence that directly relates to their case, particularly if the evidence could potentially be used against them to establish responsibility for sexual harassment. Commenters suggested that one way to protect privacy might be to provide only a hard copy of relevant documents, or a hard copy and ongoing electronic access that was limited. Some commenters also stated that all parties should have a hard copy of the evidence and ongoing electronic access. Commenters asserted that the proposed rules protect the rights of students who attend school and will calm the fears of parents who are concerned about their children being falsely accused of sexual harassment. One commenter, anticipating criticism, argued that ''victim-centered'' approaches do not work in a context where both parties have a right to present their case, and where schools have a duty to fairly determine whether a party is responsible. Another commenter suggested that FERPA's provision allowing the production of student records in connection with a law enforcement action might also reduce tension between the proposed rules and FERPA.

Commenters also noted that the proposed rules are good for providing predictability and certainty when a conflict between Title IX and FERPA does arise, which is what recipients need in order to comply with both. One student expressed appreciation that the proposed rules expressly recognized and considered FERPA in its provisions. Some commenters noted that it was appropriate to favor due process in cases where that principle conflicts with FERPA, since due process is a constitutional right, while FERPA is a Federal statute. Several commenters suggested that the proposed rules would ensure justice for victims and protections for those falsely accused.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the comments in support of its proposed regulations and agrees that a recipient may comply with both these final regulations and FERPA. The Department does not believe that the proposed or final regulations offer a ''complainant-centered'' (or ''victim-centered'') or ''respondent-centered'' approach. The Department's final regulations provide a fair, impartial process for both complainants and respondents.

The Department acknowledges that a recipient may use, but is not required to use, a file sharing platform that restricts the parties and advisors from downloading or copying evidence. In the final regulations, the Department has removed the specific reference to such a file sharing platform to emphasize that using such a platform is discretionary and not mandatory.

A recipient must provide both parties an equal opportunity to inspect and review any evidence obtained as part of the investigation that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint, as described in § 106.45(b)(5)(vi). The Department also specifies in § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) that the recipient must send to each party and the party's advisor, if any, the evidence subject to inspection and review in an electronic format. The Department neither requires nor prohibits a recipient from providing parties with a hard copy of the investigative report in § 106.45(b)(5)(vii) or any evidence obtained as part of an investigation that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint as described in § 106.45(b)(5)(vi). To clarify the Department's position in this regard, the Department revised § 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii) to allow a recipient to provide a hard copy of the evidence and investigative report to the party and the party's advisor of choice, or to provide the evidence and investigative report in an electronic format. The Department discusses this revision in the ''Section 106.45(b)(5)(vi) Inspection and Review of Evidence Directly Related to the Allegations, and Directed Question 7'' subsection and the ''Section 106.45(b)(5)(vii) An Investigative Report that Fairly Summarizes Relevant Evidence'' subsection of the ''Investigation'' subsection of the ''Section 106.45 Recipient's Response to Formal Complaints'' section of this preamble.

The Department does not fully understand how the provision in FERPA allowing the production of student records in connection with a law enforcement action might also reduce tension between the proposed rules and FERPA. These final regulations do not directly implicate law enforcement, and it is not clear how these final regulations directly implicate or address any exemptions under FERPA that allow for the disclosure of personally identifiable information from an education record without consent in relation to a law enforcement action.

The Department is not ''favoring'' due process over FERPA. As explained earlier in this section, the Department is bound by the U.S. Constitution, including the Due Process Clause in the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendment. The Department, thus, cannot administer Title IX or FERPA in a manner that deprives persons of due process of law.

Changes: The Department revised § 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii) to allow a recipient to provide a hard copy of the evidence and investigative report to the party and the party's advisor of choice or to provide the evidence and investigative report in an electronic format.

Comments: Many commenters thought that the proposed rules appropriately balanced student privacy with the need for students to obtain evidence during the Title IX grievance process. One commenter stated that the provisions of the proposed rules are necessary to ensure that respondents have the evidence that they need to defend themselves from false accusations, and that schools occasionally deprive respondents of relevant evidence under the guise of student privacy. Some commenters argued that because schools have had a negative track record in providing relevant evidence to respondents, it was important for the proposed rules to avoid giving schools too much flexibility in applying Title IX, which ensures that schools cannot abuse the process in order to disadvantage respondents. One commenter asserted that without the proposed rules, most parents could not in good conscience send their sons to college, given the possibility of being denied due process when defending against an accusation of sexual harassment.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the commenters' support of its proposed regulations and agrees that the grievance process in § 106.45 for formal complaints of sexual harassment provides sufficient due process protections for both complainants and respondents.

Changes: None.

Comments: Many commenters suggested that there was no true conflict between FERPA and Title IX in terms of the requirements surrounding evidence production. According to the commenters, this is because there is nothing in FERPA that prevents the parties from gaining access to the evidence that directly relates to their case, and which may be used against them in the Title IX process. One commenter stated that FERPA includes provisions that relate to the disclosure of information related to a sexual assault allegation, and the commenter cited a provision that specifically allows schools to disclose to the alleged victim of any crime of violence or rape and other sexual assaults, the final results of any disciplinary proceedings conducted by the institution against the alleged perpetrator of the offense.[1567] This commenter stated that FERPA's limits on redisclosure of information do not apply to information that institutions are required to disclose under the Clery Act.[1568] The commenter also stated that institutions may not require a complainant to abide by a nondisclosure agreement in writing or otherwise in a way that would prevent the re-disclosure of this information.

Discussion: The Department agrees that there is no inherent conflict between these final regulations implementing Title IX, and FERPA and its implementing regulations with respect to the Title IX requirements concerning evidence production. The Department acknowledges that provisions in FERPA, e.g. 20 U.S.C. 1232g(b)(6), address the conditions permitting the disclosure, without prior written consent, to an alleged victim of a crime of violence or a nonforcible sex offense, among others, of the final results of any disciplinary proceeding conducted by an institution against the alleged perpetrator of such crime or offense with respect to such crime or offense.[1569] The Department also acknowledges § 99.33(c), concerning the inapplicability of the general limitations in FERPA on the redisclosure of personally identifiable information contained in education records that the Clery Act and its implementing regulations require to be disclosed.

The Department does not interpret Title IX as either requiring recipients to, or prohibiting recipients from, using a non-disclosure agreement, as long as such non-disclosure agreement does not restrict the ability of either party to discuss the allegations under investigation or to gather and present relevant evidence under § 106.45(b)(5)(iii). Any non-disclosure agreement, however, must comply with all applicable laws.

Changes: None.

Comments: Some commenters suggested that concerns regarding the private information of complainants were either overstated or outweighed by the need to reach a fair conclusion in the Title IX process. One commenter stated that there is no way to provide adequate due process while still avoiding the discomfort complainants may feel having to review the investigative report that contains summaries of traumatic incidents which include private details about the complainant. This commenter suggested that while recipients may be allowed to redact highly sensitive information, or threaten parties with punitive action for publicly disclosing private information in the investigative report or evidence collected by the investigator, both parties need to be able to review the evidence and the investigative report. The commenter believed that exchange of evidence, and reviewing the investigative report, is necessary to provide due process for both parties.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the comments in support of its proposed regulations. The Department acknowledges that sharing information may be uncomfortable and that sharing such information in a grievance process under § 106.45 is necessary to provide adequate due process to both parties. Each party should be able inspect and review any evidence obtained as part of the investigation that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint, as this evidence may be used to support or challenge the allegations in a formal complaint.

Changes: None.

Comments: Some commenters opposed most of the proposed rules but stated their appreciation that the proposed rules acknowledged FERPA and that schools had a duty to comply with FERPA to the extent compliance was consistent with Title IX. One commenter stated the proposed rules were workable so long as a recipient itself has sole discretion to determine what evidence is directly related to sexual harassment allegations. The commenter suggested that any process where OCR second guesses a recipient's determination as to whether documents are directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint will significantly impair a recipient's ability to provide a prompt and equitable resolution and will effectively turn disputes among the recipient and the parties about evidence into Federal matters. Other commenters supported the proposed rule, noting that even in cases of private medical or behavioral information, if that information is relevant to an allegation of sexual harassment, then the party needing access to the records should have it.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the comments in support of these final regulations. A recipient has some discretion to determine whether evidence obtained as part of an investigation is directly related to allegations raised in a formal complaint as described in § 106.45(b)(5)(vi), and the Department is required to enforce both FERPA and Title IX. The Department previously noted that the ''directly related to'' requirement in § 106.45(b)(vi) aligns with FERPA. For example, the regulations implementing FERPA define education records as records that are ''directly related to a student'' pursuant to § 99.3. Accordingly, the Department in enforcing both FERPA and Title IX is well positioned to determine whether records constitute education records and also whether records are directly related to the allegations in a formal complaint. The Department has a responsibility to administer both FERPA and Title IX and cannot shirk its responsibility. If a party files a complaint that the recipient did not provide the party with an equal opportunity to inspect and review any evidence obtained as part of the investigation that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint, then the Department will investigate and must determine whether the recipient complied with § 106.45(b)(5)(vi).

In the final regulations, the Department has clarified in § 106.45(b)(5)(i) that a recipient cannot access, consider, disclose, or otherwise use a party's records that are made or maintained by a physician, psychiatrist, psychologist, or other recognized professional or paraprofessional acting in the professional's or paraprofessional's capacity, or assisting in that capacity, and which are made and maintained, in connection with provision of treatment to the party, unless the recipient obtains that party's voluntary, written consent to do so for the grievance process under § 106.45(b).[1570] This provision prevents the recipient from accessing, considering, disclosing, or otherwise using such records without the party's knowledge for a grievance process under § 106.45(b). If the party would like the recipient to access, consider, disclose, or otherwise use such records in a grievance process under § 106.45(b), then the party must give the recipient voluntary, written consent to do so. If the party is not an ''eligible student,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3, then the recipient must obtain the voluntary, written consent of a ''parent,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3. Absent such voluntary, written consent, a recipient may not access, consider, disclose, or otherwise use such records in a grievance process under § 106.45(b). If a party provides such voluntary, written consent and if such records are directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint, then the recipient must provide both parties an equal opportunity to inspect and review the records pursuant to § 106.45(b)(5)(vi).

Changes: The Department clarified in § 106.45(b)(5)(i) that a recipient cannot access, consider, disclose, or otherwise use a party's records that are made or maintained by a physician, psychiatrist, psychologist, or other recognized professional or paraprofessional acting in the professional's or [1570] While the Department based this regulatory provision on the exemption for treatment records in the definition of the term ''education records,'' as set forth in FERPA at 20 U.S.C. 1232g(a)(4)(B)(iv), we made two minor modifications to the FERPA exemption to better align the provision in these final regulations with the purpose of protecting the privacy of such treatment records in a grievance process under § 106.45, rather than the purpose of the exemption for treatment records in FERPA, which is to disallow college students from being able ''directly to inspect'' such treatment records, although allowing college students to have ''a doctor or other professional of their choice inspect their records.'' ''Joint Statement in Explanation of the Buckley/Pell Amendment [to FERPA],'' 120 Cong. Rec. 39858, 39862 (Dec. 13, 1974). For this reason, we removed the limitation in the FERPA definition of treatment records narrowing the applicability of the exemption to students who are 18 years of age or older or in attendance at an institution of postsecondary education because this provision should apply to any party in a grievance process under § 106.45, regardless of that party's age. We also revised the phrase used in the FERPA exemption, ''made, maintained, or used only in connection with the provision of treatment to the student,'' to ''made and maintained in connection with the provision of treatment to the party'' so that this provision will apply where a recipient has the discretion under FERPA to use treatment records for other than treatment purposes, such as billing or litigation purposes. Thus, under these final regulations a recipient cannot access, consider, disclose, or otherwise use a party's records that are made or maintained by a physician, psychiatrist, psychologist, or other recognized professional or paraprofessional acting in the professional's or paraprofessional's capacity, or assisting in that capacity, and which are made and maintained in connection with the provision of treatment to the party, unless the recipient obtains that party's voluntary, written consent to do so for a grievance process under § 106.45. Also, if the party is not an ''eligible student,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3 (FERPA regulations), then the recipient must obtain the voluntary, written consent of a ''parent,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3.

paraprofessional's capacity, or assisting in that capacity, and which are made and maintained in connection with the provision of treatment to the party, unless the recipient obtains that party's voluntary, written consent. If the party is not an ''eligible student,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3, then the recipient must obtain the voluntary, written consent of a ''parent,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3.

Comments: One commenter cautioned the Department that the proposed rules would not garner as many supportive comments as critical comments, but that the Department should pay more attention to reason and logic, as opposed to sheer numbers. The commenter argued that opponents of the proposed rules are better funded, and that there is less of a stigma to openly criticizing the Department than there is in saying that one was accused of sexual harassment, even if wrongly accused, and openly supporting the Department's proposed rules. Another commenter argued that depriving respondents of relevant evidence only created more victims, not fewer.

Discussion: The Department appreciates the commenters' perspectives.

Changes: None.

Comments: Several commenters opposed the requirement in § 106.45(b)(5)(v) (written notice of investigative interviews, meetings, and hearings) because they stated it generally conflicts with FERPA. One commenter suggested adding a FERPA compliance clause to § 106.45(b)(5)(v) due to concerns about student privacy.

One commenter argued specifically that the requirement in § 106.45(b)(5)(v) that recipients disclose the identities of all the parties' conflicts with FERPA. One commenter specifically argued that requiring a recipient to disclose all sanctions imposed on the respondent conflicts with the school's responsibilities under FERPA. Several commenters specifically suggested that the Department remove from the documentation of the recipient's response to a Title IX complaint any requirement to include information regarding remedies and supportive measures accessed by a complainant who is a student.

Several commenters stated that the parties should not be informed of the remedies given to the complainant, or to the disciplinary sanctions imposed on the respondent, in cases where the allegation involves assault, stalking, dating violence, or other violent crimes. Not only does disclosure of these items violate FERPA, but it would be troubling, for instance, to inform a respondent that after they were found responsible, the complainant was given remedies like moving to other classes, counseling, and so on. Commenters also asserted that the respondent who is found responsible should not have any knowledge about what safety measures the school is taking to protect the complainant, since those very measures will be undermined if the respondent learns of them. In support of these arguments, some commenters cited the Clery Act, arguing that it requires less than the proposed rule, and that the final regulations should map Clery specifically. These commenters asserted that when such results become final, § 668.46(k)(2)(v) of the Clery Act regulations further clarify that the ''result'' must include any sanctions and rationale for results and sanction, notwithstanding FERPA.

Discussion: The Department disagrees that § 106.45(b)(5)(v) inherently or directly conflicts with FERPA. A recipient should interpret Title IX and FERPA in a manner to avoid any conflicts. To the extent that there may be rare and unusual circumstances, where a true conflict between Title IX and FERPA exists, the Department includes a provision in § 106.6(e) to expressly state that the obligation to comply with these final regulations under Title IX is not obviated or alleviated by the FERPA statute or regulations. Section 106.45(b)(5)(v) requires recipients to provide to the party whose participation is invited or expected written notice of all hearings, investigative interviews, or other meetings with a party, with sufficient time for the party to prepare to participate in the proceeding. The Department notes that this provision is similar to the provision in the Department's regulations, implementing the Clery Act, which requires timely notice of meetings at which the accuser or accused, or both, may be present and provides timely and equal access to the accuser, the accused, and appropriate officials to any information that will be used during informal and formal disciplinary meetings and hearings under § 668.46(k)(3)(1)(B). The Department has not interpreted its regulations, implementing the Clery Act, to violate FERPA and will not interpret similar regulations in these final regulations to violate FERPA.

There is no need to add a FERPA compliance clause in this particular section, as a recipient is always required to comply with all applicable laws. Adding a FERPA compliance clause would contradict the General Education Provisions Act (GEPA), 20 U.S.C. 1221(d), which is reflected in § 106.6(e). GEPA provides in relevant part: ''Nothing in this chapter shall be construed to affect the applicability of title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, title V of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, the Age Discrimination Act, or other statutes prohibiting discrimination, to any applicable program.'' [1571] Since at least 2001, the Department has interpreted ''this provision to mean that FERPA continues to apply in the context of Title IX enforcement, but if there is a direct conflict between the requirements of FERPA and the requirements of Title IX, such that enforcement of FERPA would interfere with the primary purpose of Title IX to eliminate sex-based discrimination in schools, the requirements of Title IX override any conflicting FERPA provisions.'' [1572] Section 106.6(e) reflects the Department's longstanding interpretation of GEPA and provides that the ''obligation to comply with this part is not obviated or alleviated by the FERPA statute, 20 U.S.C. 1232g, or FERPA regulations, 34 CFR part 99.''

A party such as a complainant or respondent must know who the other parties in a formal complaint are in order to support or challenge the allegations in the formal complaint. With respect to recipients that are State actors, constitutional due process would require as much. As previously stated, the Department interprets these final regulations in a manner that will not require a recipient to violate a person's constitutional due process rights, whether the recipient is private or public.

Additionally, FERPA and its implementing regulations define the term ''education records'' as meaning, with certain exceptions, records that are directly related to a student and maintained by an educational agency or institution, or by a party acting for the agency or institution.[1573] The Department previously stated: ''Under this definition, a parent (or eligible student) has a right to inspect and review any witness statement that is directly related to the student, even if that statement contains information that is also directly related to another student, if the information cannot be segregated and redacted without destroying its meaning.'' [1574] The Department made this statement in response to comments regarding impairing due process in student discipline cases in its notice-and-comment rulemaking to promulgate regulations to implement FERPA.[1575] Written notices under § 106.45(b)(5)(v) may pertain to students who are complainants or respondents, in which case they would need to know who is being interviewed as a witness in an investigation of the formal complaint of harassment.

FERPA, 20 U.S.C. 1232g(b)(6), and its implementing regulations, 34 CFR 99.31(a)(13)–(a)(14) and 34 CFR 99.39, address the conditions permitting the disclosure, without prior written consent, to an alleged victim of a crime of violence or a nonforcible sex offense, among others, of the final results of any disciplinary proceeding conducted by an institution against the alleged perpetrator of such crime or offense with respect to such crime or offense. Similarly, the Clery Act, 20 U.S.C. 1092(g)(8)(B)(ii), and its implementing regulations, 34 CFR 668.46(k)(3)(iv), require an institution to provide the result of a proceeding, including any sanctions imposed by the institution, to both parties. The Department believes that both parties should receive the same information about the result as to each allegation, including a determination regarding responsibility, the reasons for the determination, any sanctions the recipient imposes on the respondent, and whether remedies will be provided by the recipient to the complainant, under § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(E) as revised in the final regulations.[1576] The Department believes that the result as to each allegation in a formal complaint of sexual harassment concerns both parties and clarifies in the final regulations that the result includes both sanctions and whether remedies will be provided. The result of each determination, including listing any sanctions and stating whether remedies will be provided, should help ensure that no person is excluded from participation in, denied the benefits of, or subjected to discrimination under any education program or activity receiving Federal financial assistance without unnecessarily disclosing to the respondent the details of remedies provided to the complainant. The details of remedies provided to the complainant remain part of the complainant's education record and not the respondent's education record, unless the remedy also imposes requirements on the respondent. We acknowledge that sanctions may at times overlap with remedies. For example, the recipient may impose a unilateral no-contact order on the respondent as part of a sanction that also may constitute a remedy. Under the final regulations, the written determination should list the one-way no-contact order as a sanction against the respondent and state that the recipient will provide remedies to the complainant. Thus, even where the no-contact order constitutes both a sanction and a remedy, the written determination would only list the measure insofar as it constitutes a sanction, preserving as much confidentiality as possible around the particular nature of a complainant's remedies. By way of further example, if a recipient wishes to change the housing arrangement of the complainant as part of a remedy, the written determination should simply state that remedies will be provided to the complainant; the complainant would then communicate separately with the Title IX Coordinator to discuss remedies,[1577] and the decision to change the complainant's housing arrangement as part of a remedy would not have been disclosed to the respondent in the written determination. That remedy (which does not directly affect the respondent) must not be disclosed to the respondent.

Changes: The Department revised § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(E) to state that the written determination must include any sanctions the recipient imposes on the respondent, and whether remedies designed to restore or preserve equal access to the recipient's education program or activity will be provided by the recipient to the complainant.

Comments: Commenters objected to the proposed rule, stating that Title IX should not control over FERPA, but vice versa—FERPA should take precedence over Title IX in cases of a conflict. Some commenters suggested that the 2001 Guidance more effectively handled these types of FERPA issues, and better avoided blanket statements about whether FERPA ought to be superseded by Title IX. One suggested an express statement that Title IX overrides FERPA, arguing that the 2001 Guidance states as much unambiguously. Commenters stated that the proposed rules exacerbate the conflict between FERPA and Title IX. Several commenters stated that the final regulations ought to specify that complainants have the right to keep their education records private. Some commenters even stated that the Department lacked the authority to tell schools that Title IX controls over FEPRA, and that schools have an independent duty to comply with FERPA. Some commenters suggested removing any mention of FERPA, since it might confuse recipients to mention it, but say that Title IX supersedes FERPA in the case of a conflict. Other commenters asserted it might be confusing because FERPA does not apply to the types of information likely to be shared under the grievance procedures. These commenters contended that the proposed rules were not ''trauma-informed,'' inasmuch as they are overly focused on addressing the minor problem of false accusations, as opposed to remedying sexual harassment.

Many commenters argued that FERPA does not authorize one student—or an employee, for that matter—to review the education records of a student merely because the student complains of sexual harassment. One commenter expressed concern that the proposed rules would require the sharing of student records with employees who would otherwise not be authorized to view records without the student's consent.

Some commenters suggested that the preamble's justification for records that relate to a student being construed as an exception to FERPA is wrong.

[1576] The Department's position is consistent with the 2001 Guidance, that FERPA does not conflict with the Title IX requirement ''that the school notify the harassed student of the outcome of its investigation, i.e., whether or not harassment was found to have occurred, because this information directly relates to the victim.'' 2001 Guidance at vii. The Department, however, departs from the 2001 Guidance inasmuch as that guidance document stated, ''FERPA generally prevents a school from disclosing to a student who complained of harassment information about the sanction, or discipline imposed upon a student who was found to have engaged in that harassment.'' Id. The Department acknowledged in the 2001 Guidance that exceptions ''include the case of a sanction that directly relates to the person who was harassed (e.g., an order that the harasser stay away from the harassed student), or sanctions related to offenses for which there is a statutory exception, such as crimes of violence or certain sex offenses in postsecondary institutions.'' Id. at fn. 3. Through these final regulations, the Department takes the position that sanctions always directly impact the victim, as to sanctions imposed for any conduct described in § 106.30 as ''sexual harassment,'' irrespective of whether the sanction is for a crime of violence or certain sex offenses, for quid pro quo sexual harassment, or for the Davis definition of sexual harassment in § 106.30. Irrespective of whether the sexual harassment rises to the level of a crime of violence, the sanction directly relates to the victim who should know what to expect after the conclusion of the grievance process. For example, the victim should know whether the perpetrator was expelled, or whether the perpetrator was suspended for a period of time, as such information will inevitably impact the victim. The sanction represents part of the recipient's response to addressing sexual harassment, and the victim should know how the sexual harassment which the victim suffered, was addressed.

[1577] To clarify this, the final regulations additionally revise § 106.45(b)(7)(iv) to state that the Title IX Coordinator is responsible for the effective implementation of remedies. Thus, where a written determination states that remedies will be provided, the complainant may contact the Title IX Coordinator to discuss the nature and implementation of such remedies.

Commenters contended that not every document that relates to a complainant or to an incident relates to the respondent. Schools, if they comply with the rule, asserted commenters, will be held accountable for their FERPA violations. Commenters stated the Department should reconsider whether the parties ought to be entitled to physical, mental, and academic performance records of other students.

Other commenters argued that the proposed rules would force schools to violate State law, for which they also have an independent legal duty to comply. For instance, commenters asserted that the Department cannot require schools to provide recordings that were obtained in violation of a State's two-party consent law for recordings. Commenters cited Florida and Washington law for these arguments. They argued that Washington State protects IEPs (individualized education plans) and Section 504 plans from production, but the proposed regulations would likely allow the production of these records in some cases. One commenter asserted that Florida law protects records related to sexual harassment until a finding is made, so the proposed rules will force schools to violate Florida law. A few commenters proposed that the Department should indicate whether it thinks that Title IX reports and files should be subject to a public records request, and if so, the scope and extent of such requests.

Discussion: The Department disagrees that § 106.45(b)(5)(v) inherently or directly conflicts with FERPA. A recipient should interpret Title IX and FERPA in a manner to avoid any conflicts. To the extent that there may be unusual circumstances, where a true conflict between Title IX and FERPA may exist (such as a student's formal complaint against an employee), the Department includes a provision in § 106.6(e) to expressly state that the obligation to comply with these final regulations under Title IX is not obviated or alleviated by the FERPA statute or regulations. In addressing conflicts between FERPA and Title IX, the Department in the Preamble of the 2001 Guidance states:

> In 1994, as part of the Improving America's Schools Act, Congress amended the General Education Provisions Act (GEPA)—of which FERPA is a part—to state that nothing in GEPA ''shall be construed to affect the applicability of . . . title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972 . . . .'' The Department interprets this provision to mean that FERPA continues to apply in the context of Title IX enforcement, but if there is a direct conflict between requirements of FERPA and requirements of Title IX, such that enforcement of FERPA would interfere with the primary purpose of Title IX to eliminate sex-based discrimination in schools, the requirements of Title IX override any conflicting FERPA provisions.[1578]

The General Education Provisions Act (GEPA), of which FERPA is a part, states: ''Nothing in this chapter shall be construed to affect the applicability of title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, title V of the Rehabilitation Act of 1973, the Age Discrimination Act, or other statutes prohibiting discrimination, to any applicable program.'' [1579] The legislative history underlying this provision in GEPA demonstrates that Congress did not intend for GEPA to limit the implementation or enforcement of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. There is not much legislative history with respect to the 1994 amendment to GEPA,[1580] adding Title IX, but the legislative history with respect to the 1974 amendment to GEPA,[1581] concerning Title VI of the Civil Rights Act, is instructive. The legislative history reveals the Senate was concerned that certain provisions in GEPA may limit the Civil Rights Act of 1964.[1582] Consequently, the Senate specifically stated that ''in order to make clear that the provisions in the [GEPA] do not conflict with the Civil Rights Act of 1964, subparagraph (B) expressly states that such Civil Rights Act is not an applicable statute and therefore subject to limitations on interpretations of such a statute which may occur in [GEPA].'' [1583] The Senate's proposed amendment was slightly revised in the conference committee, but there was no mention of any change in purpose or scope. Specifically, the Conference Report from the House notes that the final amendments to GEPA include language that expressly addresses the conflict between GEPA and Title VI.[1584] This Conference Report provides in relevant part:

> The Senate amendment, but not the House bill, clarifies that for the purposes of the General Education Provisions Act, the Civil Rights Act shall not be considered an applicable statute, but shall continue to have full force and effect over education programs. . . . The conference substitute contains these provisions of the Senate amendment, except that the provision relating to the Civil Rights Act of 1964 states that nothing in the General Education Provisions Act shall be construed to affect the applicability of such [Civil Rights Act of 1964] to any program subject to the provisions of the General Education Provisions Act.[1585]

The legislative history thus supports the Department's 2001 interpretation that Congress intended the Civil Rights Act of 1964 to override GEPA, which includes FERPA, if there was a direct conflict between the two statutes. When Congress amended GEPA to also include Title IX in the same section and context as Title VI, Congress presumably intended that Title IX, like Title VI, override GEPA, including FERPA, if there was a direct conflict. The Department's position is consistent with its 2001 Guidance, and the Department is not departing from this position.

The Department has the authority to enforce both Title IX under 20 U.S.C. 1681 and 34 CFR part 106 and FERPA under 20 U.S.C. 1232g and 34 CFR part 99. Whether FERPA applies to a particular record is a fact-specific determination that FERPA and its implementing regulations address, not these final regulations.

The Department disagrees that the proposed regulations are not ''trauma-informed'' insofar as the Department recognizes and acknowledges the traumatic impact of sexual harassment and aims to hold recipients accountable for legally binding obligations throughout these final regulations in part because the experience of sexual harassment can traumatize victims in a way that jeopardizes the victim's equal access to education. The Department disagrees that these final regulations are overly focused on addressing false allegations instead of remedying sexual harassment. The Department notes that under § 106.44(a), the Title IX Coordinator must promptly contact the complainant to discuss the availability of supportive measures as defined in § 106.30, consider the complainant's wishes with respect to supportive measures, inform the complainant of the availability of supportive measures with or without the filing of a formal complaint, and explain to the complainant the process for filing a formal complaint. Accordingly, complainants have more control over the process to address their allegations of sexual harassment.

As previously explained, FERPA and its implementing regulations define the term ''education records'' as meaning, with certain exceptions, records that are directly related to a student and maintained by an educational agency or institution, or by a party acting for the agency or institution.[1586] The Department previously stated: ''Under this definition, a parent (or eligible student) has a right to inspect and review any witness statement that is directly related to the student, even if that statement contains information that is also directly related to another student, if the information cannot be segregated and redacted without destroying its meaning.'' [1587] The Department's statement was made in response to a comment about FERPA impairing due process in student disciplinary proceedings. The Department does not think that evidence obtained as part of an investigation pursuant to these final regulations that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint can be segregated and redacted because the evidence directly relates to allegations by a complainant against a respondent and, thus, constitutes an education record of both the complainant and a respondent. A formal complaint that raises allegations against a student-respondent is directly related to that student. The Department is bound by the U.S. Constitution and must interpret Title IX and FERPA in a manner that does not violate a person's due process rights, including notice and an opportunity to respond. If a complainant or respondent provides sensitive records such as medical records as part of an investigation, then the parties must have an equal opportunity to inspect and review information that constitutes evidence directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint. If some of the information in the medical records is not directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint, then these final regulations do not require a recipient to share the information that is not directly related to the allegations raised in the formal complaint. As previously explained, the Department has clarified in § 106.45(b)(5)(i) that a recipient cannot access, consider, disclose, or otherwise use a party's records that are made or maintained by a physician, psychiatrist, psychologist, or other recognized professional or paraprofessional acting in the professional's or paraprofessional's capacity, or assisting in that capacity, and which are made and maintained in connection with provision of treatment to the party, unless the recipient obtains that party's voluntary, written consent to do so for the grievance process under § 106.45(b). Accordingly, a recipient would not have access to a party's medical records unless that party gave the recipient voluntary, written consent to do so for a grievance process under § 106.45(b). If the party is not an ''eligible student,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3, then the recipient must obtain the voluntary, written consent of a ''parent,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3.

The Department is not persuaded that these final regulations require a recipient to violate State law. If a recipient knows that a recording is unlawfully created under State law, then the recipient should not share a copy of such unlawful recording. The Department is not requiring a recipient to disseminate any evidence that was illegally or unlawfully obtained. Similarly, the Florida laws that the commenter cites, Florida Statutes §§ 119.071(2)(g)(1) and 1012.31(3)(a)(1) concern public disclosure of records under sunshine laws, and the Department is not requiring that a recipient widely disseminate public records upon request. The Department's requirement concerns disclosure solely to the other party to provide sufficient notice and an opportunity to respond. Similarly, the Department takes no position in these final regulations on whether records generated during a Title IX grievance process must, or should, become subject to disclosure under State sunshine laws. The Department also is not regulating on FERPA in this rulemaking and takes no position in this rulemaking as to FERPA's potential restrictions on the nonconsensual disclosure of student's education records in the context of sunshine law. Sunshine laws vary among states. Additionally, the manner in which a request under State sunshine laws is handled depends on the unique context and circumstances of the particular request. A recipient also would not be required to release an IEP or Section 504 plan that is in the recipient's possession. A recipient is required to provide any evidence ''obtained as part of the investigation that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint'' under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi); however, the final regulations revise § 106.45(b)(5)(i) to restrict a recipient from accessing, considering, disclosing, or otherwise using a party's records that are made or maintained by a physician, psychiatrist, psychologist, or other recognized professional or paraprofessional acting in the professional's or paraprofessional's capacity, or assisting in that capacity, and which are made and maintained in connection with provision of treatment to the party, unless the recipient obtains that party's voluntary, written consent to do so for a grievance process under § 106.45(b). If the party is not an ''eligible student,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3, then the recipient must obtain the voluntary, written consent of a ''parent,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3. When a party offers an IEP or Section 504 plan as part of the evidence that a recipient should consider, or has granted the recipient consent to use those records in a Title IX grievance process, then the other party should be able to inspect and review this evidence, if that evidence is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint.

Comments: Several commenters argued that the proposed rules would put schools in direct conflict with FERPA, and that FERPA does not maintain an exception that would be applicable for all Title IX grievance proceedings. Some noted that there is no express carve-out under FERPA for such proceedings, and that schools will quickly be caught trying to navigate the legal boundaries of their obligations. The need to hire legal counsel to figure out these issues will be immediate, asserted some commenters, and schools will have difficulty believing that they really ought to be reviewing and potentially sharing with other students one student's medical records, therapy notes, or documents that contain information about prior sexual history.

One commenter argued that there is an internal contradiction, given that supportive measures are supposed to remain confidential, with § 106.45(b)(7), the provision regarding disclosure of the results of grievance process.[1588]

One commenter stated that the proposed rules leave ambiguity about whether FERPA will apply to conduct that is not covered by these proposed regulations under Title IX because it does not rise to the level of the definition of sexual harassment in § 106.30, which this commenter characterizes as narrower than the Department's past definition.

Another commenter stated that the proposed rules give students more rights than does FERPA, since time frames for production are shorter, which the commenter believed to be bad policy. Several commenters stated that schools need flexibility on which information is private and which information is relevant to a claim of sexual harassment.

Discussion: As explained above, the Department disagrees that there is any inherent conflict between FERPA and these final regulations, which address sexual harassment under Title IX. The Department administers both Title IX and FERPA and expressly provides in § 106.6(e) that the obligation to comply with Part 106 of Title 34 of the Code of Federal Regulations ''is not obviated or alleviated by the FERPA statute, 20 U.S.C. 1232g, or FERPA regulations, 34 CFR part 99.'' The Department offers technical assistance and will address compliance with FERPA and Title IX, and recipients may consult with their own counsel about compliance with various laws. As the Department administers both FERPA and Title IX, the Department will not interpret compliance with its regulations under Title IX to violate requirements in its regulations under FERPA.

If a party (or the parent of a party) gives voluntary, written consent to a recipient under § 106.45(b)(5) to use the party's medical records that are directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint as part of its investigation, then the recipient must provide both parties with an equal opportunity to inspect and review such evidence. If some of the information in the medical records is not directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint, then these final regulations do not require a recipient to share the information that is not directly related to the allegations raised in the formal complaint. With respect to evidence of prior sexual behavior, the Department revised § 106.45(b)(6) to prohibit evidence about the complainant's sexual predisposition or prior sexual behavior unless such evidence is offered to prove that someone other than the respondent committed the conduct alleged by the complainant or to prove consent. If a recipient obtains evidence about a party's sexual predisposition or prior sexual behavior that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint, the recipient should allow both parties an equal opportunity to inspect and review such evidence to be able to prepare to respond to it or object to its introduction in the investigative report or at the hearing.

There is no internal contradiction that supportive measures should be confidential and that the result of a grievance process under § 106.45 should be made known to both parties. A complainant must be offered and may receive supportive measures irrespective of whether the complainant files a formal complaint, and the supportive measures that a complainant or a respondent receives typically relate only to them and must be kept confidential pursuant to § 106.30. The definition of supportive measures in § 106.30 clarifies that it may be necessary to notify the other party of a supportive measure if the supportive measure requires both the complainant and the respondent's cooperation (i.e., mutual restrictions on contact between the parties). The result at the end of a grievance process under § 106.45, including any sanctions and whether remedies will be provided to a complainant, impact both parties and can, and should, be part of the written determination simultaneously sent to both parties. The complainant should know what sanctions the respondent receives because knowledge of the sanctions may impact the complainant's equal access to the recipient's education program and activity. The Department revised § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(E) to require a recipient to state whether remedies will be provided to the complainant but not what remedies will be provided. Thus, the recipient may note in the written determination only that a complainant will receive remedies but should not note in the written determination that the recipient, for example, will change the complainant's housing arrangements as part of a remedy. A respondent should know whether the recipient will provide remedies to the complainant because the respondent should be aware that the respondent's actions denied the complainant equal access to the recipient's education program or activity. Similarly, the parties should both know the rationale for the result as to each allegation, including a determination regarding responsibility, as provided in § 106.45(b)(7)(ii)(E), because due process principles require the recipient to provide a basis for its determination. The rationale also will reveal whether there was any unlawful bias such that there may be grounds for appeal under § 106.45(b)(8)(i)(C).

As to the commenter's question about the applicability of FERPA to conduct that is not defined in § 106.30, FERPA applies to all education records as defined in 20 U.S.C. 1232g(a)(4)(A) and 34 CFR 99.3. Whether FERPA applies does not depend on whether the conduct at issue satisfies the definition defined in § 106.30. Accordingly, there is no inherent conflict between FERPA, and these final regulations addressing sexual harassment under Title IX.

The Department does not believe that these final regulations give students more rights than FERPA due to short time frames for production. The Department acknowledges that under 20 U.S.C. 1232g(a)(1)(A) and § 99.10(b) in the FERPA regulations, an educational agency or institution must comply with a request for access to covered education records within a reasonable period of time, but not more than 45 days after it has received the request. FERPA, however, was only intended to establish a minimum Federal standard for access to education records [1589] and thus other laws may require access to education records in a shorter time frame than FERPA does. A recipient, moreover, has an obligation to include reasonably prompt time frames for the conclusion of a grievance process as described in § 106.45(b)(1)(v). Taking 45 days to respond to a request for access to records would not provide a reasonably prompt time frame for the conclusion of a grievance process. The ten-day time frame in these final regulations governs the minimum length of time that the parties have to submit a written response to the recipient after the recipient sends to each party and the party's advisor, if any, the evidence subject to inspection and review. These final regulations do not require a recipient to obtain evidence within a specific time frame, although a recipient is required to include reasonably prompt time frames for the conclusion of a grievance process pursuant to § 106.45(b)(1)(v) and to respond promptly under § 106.44(a). Additionally, the school has some discretion to determine what evidence is directly related to the allegations in a formal complaint.

Changes: None.

Comments: Some commenters expressed concern about the fact that private information would be readily shared with another party. One commenter asserted that the proposed regulations facilitate—rather than discourage—retaliation by having an opposing party learn confidential information about the complainant. One commenter argued that giving students access to other students' files would lead to bullying and intimidation. Commenters suggested that even if one minor portion of a document is relevant—perhaps a medical examination that occurred on the night of an alleged rape—the rest of the medical information may include a wealth of information that is totally irrelevant to the complaint, and should be redacted. A commenter argued that some documents may involve non-parties such that disclosing a complainant's documents to a respondent could reveal private information that has nothing to do with the complainant. The commenter suggested that the Department modify the proposed regulations to insist that schools redact irrelevant information from information produced to the parties.

Similarly, commenters suggested that the disadvantage to the privacy issues would always fall, asymmetrically, on complainants. These commenters stated respondents will typically have little information in their student file that is relevant to the accusation—no rape kits, no medical or counseling information, etc.—so providing student files is asymmetrically damaging to a complainant.

Many commenters contended that there will be a chilling effect on student-complainants obtaining counseling services, if counseling records must be disclosed to a respondent. Some commenters stated that even victims who do report will often dismiss their own complaints once they realize that there is a chance of being humiliated by their records being disclosed to their harasser, and for those records to go public. One commenter stated that this effect would be particularly damaging to women of color, arguing that these women report sexual harassment at very low rates, and would be deterred from reporting if their privacy were at stake.

Some contended that even student-witnesses will be unwilling to come forward, believing that their student records might also be subject to discovery by the respondent. These commenters stated that student-witnesses will be subject to threats and intimidation, as well as potential witness tampering.

Discussion: The Department disagrees that these final regulations will lead to retaliation. As a precaution, the Department adopts a provision in § 106.71 to expressly prohibit retaliation to address the commenter's concerns. This retaliation provision is broad and would prohibit threats and intimidation as well as interfering with potential witnesses.

The Department also disagrees that the parties will be able to obtain information that is unrelated to the allegations raised in a formal complaint. Section 106.45(b)(5)(vi) only requires a recipient to provide both parties an equal opportunity to inspect and review any evidence that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint as part of the investigation. Accordingly, if there is information in a medical record that is not directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint, these final regulations do not require a recipient to share such information. Consistent with FERPA, these final regulations do not prohibit a recipient from redacting personally identifiable information from education records, if the information is not directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint. Accordingly, the Department does not need to revise the final regulations to specifically address redactions. A recipient, however, should be judicious in redacting information and should not redact more information than is necessary under the circumstances so as to fully comply with obligations under § 106.45.

The Department disagrees that its final regulations asymmetrically affect complainants, as respondents may have sensitive information too. For example, the recipient may obtain information from a criminal investigation of a respondent. Additionally, the rape shield provisions in § 106.45(b)(6) apply only to complainants.

The Department disagrees that these final regulations will have a chilling effect on reporting. A complainant is not required to submit counseling records to a recipient as part of an investigation. If the complainant does not want a respondent to inspect and review any counseling records that are directly related to allegations raised in a formal complaint, then the complainant is not required to release such counseling records to the recipient under § 106.45(b)(5)(i). (The Department notes that the same is true for respondents.) These final regulations do not foster complainants or respondents being humiliated and certainly do not result in their records being made public. The recipient is simply giving both parties an equal opportunity to inspect and review any evidence obtained as part of the investigation that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint so that each party can meaningfully respond to the evidence prior to the conclusion of the investigation. This provision is critical for a complainant to provide evidence in support of allegations and for a respondent to provide evidence to challenge allegations. This provision also allows each party an opportunity to meaningfully respond to the evidence that is directly related to the allegations.

The Department disagrees that these final regulations, including the provision about an equal opportunity to inspect and review any evidence, will result in increased harm to women of color. These final regulations apply to all persons, irrespective of race, national origin, or color. Some commenters suggested that respondents who are persons of color have been more severely impacted by the lack of due process protections in a grievance process. These final regulations provide everyone the same fair and impartial grievance process described in § 106.45.

Changes: The Department adopts a provision in § 106.71 to expressly prohibit retaliation.

Comments: Some commenters were not concerned about privacy issues for respondents who have been found responsible for sexual harassment. Some suggested that if a student is found responsible, that finding should follow a student if they try to enroll in a new school so as to help keep students safe in the new school. Some commenters asserted using FERPA to protect these students is unfair and endangers students at other schools when respondents who have been found responsible transfer schools. Other commenters stated that the final regulations should provide that a student's disciplinary measures cannot be conveyed to another college under FERPA, so as to avoid destroying their lives by having a finding of responsibility follow them to other schools.

Discussion: FERPA and its implementing regulations, 20 U.S.C. 1232g(b)(6) and 34 CFR 99.31(a)(13), 99.31(a)(14), and 99.39, address the conditions permitting the disclosure, without prior written consent, to an alleged victim of a crime of violence or a nonforcible sex offense and to the general public of the final results of any disciplinary proceeding conducted by an institution against the alleged perpetrator of such crime or offense with respect to such crime or offense. Recipients may have the discretion to disclose, without prior written consent, personally identifiable information from education records of student-respondents who have been found responsible for a violation of Title IX to other third parties under other exceptions to consent in FERPA. The Department notes that such disclosures of personally identifiable information are permissive and not mandatory under FERPA, and the Department takes no position in these final regulations as to whether a recipient should disclose any personally identifiable information under FERPA. For example, an exception in FERPA and its implementing regulations at 20 U.S.C. 1232g(b)(1)(B) and 34 CFR 99.31(a)(2) and 99.34 permits a school to disclose, without prior, written consent, personally identifiable information contained in a student's education records to another school in which the student seeks or intends to enroll, or where the student is already enrolled so long as the disclosure is for purposes related to the student's enrollment or transfer. The sending school may make the disclosure if it has included in its annual notification of FERPA rights a statement that it forwards education records in such circumstances. Otherwise, the sending school must make a reasonable attempt to notify the parent or eligible student in advance of making the disclosure, unless the parent or eligible student has initiated the disclosure. The school also must provide a parent or an eligible student with a copy of the records that were released, if requested by the parent or eligible student, and an opportunity to seek to amend the education records. FERPA and its implementing regulations also provide that an educational agency or institution may include and disclose, without prior, written consent, appropriate information in a student's education records concerning disciplinary information taken against such student for conduct that posed a significant risk to the safety or well-being of that student, other students, or other members of the school community to teachers and school officials, within the agency or institution or in other schools, who have legitimate educational interests in the behavior of the student.[1590] Similarly, the Clery Act, 20 U.S.C. 1092(g)(8)(B)(ii), and its implementing regulations, 34 CFR 668.46(k)(3)(iv), require an institution to provide the result of a proceeding, including any sanctions imposed by the institution, to both parties. In this manner, a recipient has discretion as to whether to share information with another school about a respondent.

The Department does not regulate what information schools must share when a student transfers to a different school and declines to do so here. Requiring institutions to share information goes beyond the mandate of Title IX to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sex in a particular recipient's education program or activity. Recipients may share such information as long as doing so is permissible under other applicable Federal, State, and local laws.

Changes: None.

Comments: Some commenters expressed concern that in cases where a formal complaint must be opened by a Title IX Coordinator, as opposed to by a student or employee reporting sexual harassment, that the victim's confidential information will be subject to discovery despite declining to file a formal complaint. This leaves students and employees with no way to protect their privacy and would lead to a dramatic chilling effect on reporting.

Discussion: The Department notes that the final regulations entirely removed proposed provision § 106.44(b)(2) that would have required a Title IX Coordinator to file a formal complaint upon receiving multiple reports against the same respondent. The final regulations do not mandate circumstances where a Title IX Coordinator is required to sign a formal complaint; rather, the final regulations leave a Title IX Coordinator with discretion to sign a formal complaint. If the Title IX Coordinator signs a formal complaint against the wishes of the complainant, then the recipient likely will have difficulty obtaining evidence from the complainant that is directly related to the allegations in a formal complaint. As previously explained, the Department revised § 106.45(b)(5)(i) to specifically state that the recipient cannot access, consider, disclose, or otherwise use a party's records that are made or maintained by a physician, psychiatrist, psychologist, or other recognized professional or paraprofessional acting in the professional's or paraprofessional's capacity, or assisting in that capacity, and which are made and maintained in connection with the provision of treatment to the party, unless the recipient obtains that party's voluntary, written consent to do so for a grievance process under this section (if a party is not an ''eligible student,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3, then the recipient must obtain the voluntary, written consent of a ''parent'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3). Accordingly, a recipient will not be able to access, consider, disclose or otherwise use such confidential records without a party's consent.

The complainant is not required to participate in the process or to provide any information to the Title IX Coordinator and in fact, the final regulations expressly protect a complainant (or other person's) right not to participate in a Title IX proceeding by including such refusal to participate in the anti-retaliation provision in § 106.71. If the recipient has commenced a § 106.45 grievance process without a cooperating complainant, the recipient must still obtain evidence about the allegations, and the complainant and respondent must have an opportunity to inspect, review, and respond to such evidence. Such evidence would be directly related to the respondent under FERPA's definition of ''education records'' [1591] because it is related to the allegations against the respondent. The respondent would have access to such education records under both FERPA and these final regulations implementing Title IX, and the Department interprets both FERPA and Title IX consistent with constitutionally guaranteed due process rights. A respondent should have notice of and a meaningful opportunity to respond to the evidence about the allegations against the respondent. Full and fair adversarial procedures increase the probability that the truth of allegations will be accurately determined,[1592] and reduce the likelihood that impermissible sex bias will affect the outcome. Accordingly, the respondent, like the complainant, must have the opportunity to inspect, review, and respond to such evidence. Even if a complainant chooses not to participate in a § 106.45 grievance process initiated by the Title IX Coordinator's signing of a formal complaint, the complainant is still treated as a party [1593] entitled to, for example, the written notice of allegations under § 106.45(b)(2), notice of meetings or interviews to which the complainant is invited under § 106.45(b)(5)(v), and a copy of the evidence subject to inspection and review under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi). Thus, the complainant would at least know what evidence was obtained and have the opportunity to respond to that evidence, if the complainant so desired.[1594] [1592] The adversarial ''system is premised on the well-tested principle that truth—as well as fairness—is 'best discovered by powerful statements on both sides of the question.'" Penson v. Ohio, 488 U.S. 75, 84 (1988) (quoting Irving R. [1593] See § 106.30 defining a ''complainant'' as ''an individual who is alleged to be the victim of conduct that could constitute sexual harassment.'' The final regulations removed the phrase ''or on whose behalf the Title IX Coordinator filed a formal complaint'' to reduce the likelihood that a complainant would feel pressured to participate in a grievance process against the complainant's wishes. Thus, even where the Title IX Coordinator signs the formal complaint that initiates the grievance process (as opposed to the complainant filing the formal complaint), the complainant is treated as a party during the grievance process yet the complainant's right not to participate is protected (for example, under the anti-retaliation provision in § 106.71).

[1590] 20 U.S.C. 1232g(h) and 34 CFR 99.36(b). As explained in the ''Section 106.44(c) Emergency Removal'' subsection in the ''Additional Rules Governing Recipients' Response'' subsection of the ''Section 106.44 Recipient's Response to Sexual Harassment,'' section of this preamble, the Department revised § 106.44(c), which concerns emergency removal, to better align with the disclosure, without prior written consent, of personally identifiable information from education records in a health and safety emergency under FERPA and its implementing regulations. Compare § 106.44(c) with 20 U.S.C. 1232g(h) and 34 CFR 99.36.

[1594] The final regulations protect a complainant's right to seek the kind of response from a recipient

The Department disagrees that these final regulations will chill reporting. These final regulations will encourage complainants to report allegations of sexual harassment because complainants must be offered supportive measures irrespective of whether they choose to file a formal complaint under § 106.44(a).[1595] These final regulations provide a fair, impartial, and transparent grievance process for formal complaints that helps ensure that all parties receive the opportunity to inspect and review any evidence obtained as part of an investigation that is directly related to the allegations in a formal complaint.

Changes: The Department revised § 106.45(b)(5)(i) to specifically state that the recipient cannot access, consider, disclose, or otherwise use a party's records that are made or maintained by a physician, psychiatrist, psychologist, or other recognized professional or paraprofessional acting in the professional's or paraprofessional's capacity, or assisting in that capacity, and which are made and maintained in connection with the provision of treatment to the party, unless the recipient obtains that party's voluntary, written consent to do so for a grievance process under this section (if a party is not an ''eligible student,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3, then the recipient must obtain the voluntary, written consent of a ''parent'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3).

Comments: Commenters expressed concerns about schools producing information to students. Some contended that the proposed rules contained provisions regarding the content of the required notice that directly conflict with FERPA. Other commenters argued that the right to appeal is generally a safety net against a lack of evidence, such that there is no need for schools to produce literally all evidence directly related to the allegation. One commenter suggested that the proposed rules would likely create an inconsistency with all other forms of student misconduct investigations, where schools generally do not provide FERPA-protected education records to the accused student. Some argued that this would put Title IX in ''least-favored nation'' status, such that only Title IX allegations were likely to trigger these privacy concerns, as opposed to allegations based on race or disability harassment.

With respect to production of documents, many commenters expressed concern that the proposed rules did not sufficiently clarify what is discoverable and what is confidential. Commenters stated that schools may opt to collect as much information as possible in their investigations, out of fear that OCR will find them in violation of the new Title IX rules, but that will also mean access to a host of irrelevant information being given to the parties. Once in the hands of students, asserted commenters, the information is totally unprotected. The proposed rule, commenters argued, does not prohibit parties from photographing and texting even highly confidential information about the other party, even when young children are involved. One commenter suggested that there should be some exceptions on production, such as nude photos or other photos of a graphic sexual nature. Even the effort to ensure that technological platforms do not allow sharing is inadequate, commenters asserted, because smart phones are ubiquitous, and because many schools will simply operate out of compliance with this requirement, due to a lack of funds for technological updates. Other commenters disagreed, however, stating that it would be better to allow easier access to electronic documents, since the inability to cut and paste from materials would make preparing one's defense more difficult.

Some commenters argued that a school having to review so much evidence prior to production will increase the cost of attorneys and advisors who need to be paid to review all evidence, turning the Title IX process into an expensive one. Some commenters stated that the natural result of this process is that students and employees in Title IX proceedings will try to hire attorneys to redact their own evidence before giving it to schools.

By way of contrast, some commenters argued that the proposed rules offer respondents more disclosure of exculpatory evidence than the Brady case does in the criminal context, which is anomalous for a noncriminal proceeding in a school setting. These commenters stated that under Brady, criminal prosecutors only have to disclose exculpatory evidence. They also stated that prosecutors do not have to produce evidence about sexual contact with the alleged perpetrator in the past, which is contrary to the proposed rule. Apart from prosecutors, commenters argued that police officers need not circulate draft reports to the people involved in a crime scene investigation, which is seemingly what commenters believed has to happen in the Title IX context.

One commenter stated that the production of so much evidence will jeopardize law enforcement investigations. Another commenter suggested that Title IX administrators will tell complainants not to submit certain evidence, out of fear that it will be produced to the respondent. One commenter stated that parties would strategically introduce evidence of academic performance and perhaps sexual history in order to embarrass the other party, and deter them from continuing the process; the commenter also suggested that introducing such evidence might bias an adjudicator against the other party. Even in the best cases, asserted commenters, adjudicators would be forced to weigh whether evidence was relevant, and forced to spend time and energy on making rulings on the admissibility of documents.

Discussion: As previously explained, there is no inherent conflict between these final regulations and FERPA. An appeal right does not address the concern that parties should have access to the universe of evidence obtained as part of the investigation that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint. Having such evidence will help parties adequately prepare for a hearing. These final regulations do not require disclosing education records in violation of FERPA as the Department has previously interpreted FERPA to allow for the disclosure of records that are directly related to a particular student in the context of impairing due process in student disciplinary proceedings where the information could not be segregated and redacted without destroying the meaning of the education records. These final regulations require disclosure of evidence that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint. As previously stated, these final regulations do not require a recipient to share information in a record that does that best meets the complainant's needs (i.e., supportive measures, a grievance process, or both) and nothing in the final regulations requires a complainant to participate in a grievance process against the complainant's wishes, even where the Title IX Coordinator signed a formal complaint initiating a grievance process against the respondent. Commenters pointed out the importance of respecting complainant autonomy and asserted that for a variety of reasons a complainant may not wish to file a formal complaint, yet may decide later to file a formal complaint or to participate in a grievance process initiated by the Title IX Coordinator. The final regulations balance these interests in deference to a complainant's autonomy and control as to whether initiating or participating in a grievance process best serves the complainant's needs.

[1595] § 106.71, prohibiting retaliation, protects any person's right not to participate in a Title IX grievance process, thereby buttressing a complainant's right under § 106.44(a) to receive supportive measures regardless of whether the complainant files a formal complaint or otherwise participates in a grievance process.

These final regulations address sexual harassment, and the Department acknowledges that recipients may use a different grievance process to address sex discrimination that is not sexual harassment just as a recipient may use a different grievance process to address allegations related to race and disability. A grievance process to address race or disability concerns different considerations than a grievance process to address sexual harassment.

The Department disagrees that these final regulations require a recipient to provide completely irrelevant evidence because § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) expressly states that the recipient must provide ''any evidence obtained as part of the investigation that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint.'' The only evidence that a recipient should be providing is evidence that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint. These final regulations neither require nor prohibit a recipient to use a file sharing platform that restricts the parties and advisors from downloading or copying the evidence. Recipients also may specify that the parties are not permitted to photograph the evidence or disseminate the evidence to the public. Recipients thus have discretion to determine what measures are reasonably appropriate to allow the parties to respond to and use the evidence at a hearing, while preventing the evidence from being used in an impermissible manner as long as such measures apply equally to both parties under § 106.45(b). Such measures may be used to address sensitive materials such as photographs with nudity.

The Department agrees that a recipient will need to review all the evidence obtained as part of the investigation and determine what evidence is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint. The Department disagrees that attorneys must conduct this review as lay persons also may determine what evidence is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint.

Irrespective of what information is available in a criminal case, the Department believes that both parties should have the opportunity to inspect and review any evidence obtained as part of an investigation that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint. The grievance process in § 106.45 does not have all of the same protections as a court proceeding in a criminal case. For example, these final regulations do not contain a comprehensive set of rules of evidence. Neither party may issue a subpoena to gather information from each other or the recipient for purposes of the grievance process under § 106.45. Neither of the parties has a right to effective assistance of counsel under these final regulations, whereas a criminal defendant does have that right throughout the criminal proceeding. Under these final regulations, the parties only receive an advisor, who does not need to be an attorney, to conduct cross-examination on behalf of that party so as to ensure that the parties do not directly cross-examine each other. The parties should have an equal opportunity to review and inspect evidence that directly relate to the allegations raised in a formal complaint as these allegations necessarily relate to both parties. Even if these final regulations did not exist, parties who are students would have a right to inspect and review records directly related to the allegations in a formal complaint under FERPA, 20 U.S.C. 1232g(a)(1)(A)–(B), and its implementing regulations, 34 CFR 99.10 through 99.12, because these records would directly relate to the parties in the complaint.[1596]

With respect to evidence of prior sexual behavior, the Department revised § 106.45(b)(6) to prohibit all evidence (and not just questions) about the complainant's sexual behavior or predisposition unless such evidence is offered to prove that someone other than the respondent committed the conduct alleged by the complainant or to prove consent. If a recipient obtains evidence about a party's sexual behavior or predisposition that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint, the recipient should allow both parties an equal opportunity to inspect and review such evidence to be able to prepare to respond to it or object to its inclusion in the investigative report and its use at the hearing.

These final regulations will not jeopardize or delay a law enforcement investigation, which is a completely separate process. If there is a concurrent law enforcement investigation, then a recipient may temporarily delay or extend the grievance process under § 106.45(b)(1)(v), as long as the recipient documents the good cause for the temporary delay or extension. A Title IX Coordinator should not encourage or discourage a party from submitting evidence and should inform both parties that the grievance process will provide them with an opportunity to inspect and review any evidence obtained as part of the investigation that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint. These final regulations do not allow a Title IX Coordinator to restrict a party's ability to provide evidence. If a Title IX Coordinator restricts a party from providing evidence, then the Title IX Coordinator would be violating these final regulations and may even have a conflict of interest or bias, as described in § 106.45(b)(1)(iii).

If the academic record of a party is directly related to the allegations of sexual harassment, then the recipient may obtain, access, use, and disclose such evidence as part of the investigation under § 106.45. For example, if a complainant alleges that the complainant frequently missed classes as a result of the sexual harassment, then the attendance records of the complainant for that class are directly related to these allegations. Accordingly, a recipient may obtain or a party may request the recipient to obtain such attendance records as part of an investigation under § 106.45, if such records are directly related to the allegations in the formal complaint. Similarly, if a student-complainant alleges that an employee-respondent sexually harassed them on a field trip and the employee-respondent or that student-complainant did not attend the field trip, then the employee-respondent may provide the attendance records for the field trip, as these attendance records are directly related to the allegations of sexual harassment. Decision-makers should be able to determine what evidence is relevant at a hearing. Decision-makers also are capable of objectively considering the evidence without developing a bias for or against a complainant or respondent and will receive training about conflicts of interest and bias from the recipient under § 106.45(b)(1)(iii).

Changes: None.

Comments: Some commenters raised questions about procedural aspects of the grievance procedures. One stated that a single rule for the number of days before certain steps of the process occurs is arbitrary. Some cases will take longer than others to review the evidence, asserted a commenter. One commenter asked whether, if evidence is not adequately uploaded and available to the parties ten days before a hearing, must the hearing be delayed, or can the parties agree to keep the hearing date in place, and mutually waive whatever requirements the proposed rules implement? The same commenter asked whether, if no waiver occurs and one of the parties objects to holding the hearing but the school insists on proceeding, must the evidence that was produced only nine days prior to the hearing be struck?

One commenter argued the proposed rules are highly prescriptive, and that is inconsistent with the 2018 Report issued by the Federal Commission on School Safety,[1597] which stated that overly prescriptive Federal standards burdened local schools.

Discussion: These final regulations require that the parties have at least ten days to submit a written response to the evidence that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint under § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) and that the parties have the investigative report at least ten days prior to a hearing under § 106.45(b)(5)(vii). The Department does not define whether these ten days are calendar days or business days, and recipients have discretion as to whether to calculate ''days'' by calendar days, business days, school days, or other reasonable method. Recipients also may give the parties more than ten days in each circumstance.

If the investigative report that fairly summarizes relevant evidence is not ready at least ten days prior to a hearing, then the recipient should wait to hold the hearing until the parties have at least ten days with the investigative report pursuant to § 106.45(b)(6)(i). If a recipient does not give the parties at least ten days with the investigative report prior to a hearing, the recipient will be found in violation of these final regulations, irrespective of whether the parties waive the requirements in these final regulations.

The Department disagrees that these final regulations are overly prescriptive because recipients still have ample discretion. For example, recipients determine what supportive measures to offer, the standard of evidence, how to weigh the evidence to reach the determination regarding responsibility, the sanction, and any remedies.

Changes: None.

Comments: Several commenters suggested that there was tension between the proposed rules and FERPA, and argued that there is a conflict between the proposed rules and 20 U.S.C. 1232g(b)(1), since records would need to be disclosed as part of the grievance process even without the written consent of the parties involved. One commenter suggested that the final regulations expressly state that ''nothing in this part shall be read in derogation of the FERPA statute, 20 U.S.C. 1232g, or FERPA regulations, 34 CFR part 99.'' In support of that argument, commenters stated that schools know FERPA well, that FERPA guidance is well-established, and should control so that schools do not have to modify their existent knowledge of privacy issues. One commenter suggested that schools and students should be bound not to disclose any information if the disclosure would be inconsistent with FERPA's provisions.

Discussion: As explained earlier, the Department disagrees that there is an inherent conflict between these final regulations and FERPA. FERPA and its implementing regulations define the term ''education records'' as meaning, with certain exemptions, records that are directly related to a student and maintained by an educational agency or institution, or by a party acting for the agency or institution.[1598] The Department previously stated: ''Under this definition, a parent (or eligible student) has a right to inspect and review any witness statement that is directly related to the student, even if that statement contains information that is also directly related to another student, if the information cannot be segregated and redacted without destroying its meaning.'' [1599] The Department made this statement in response to comments regarding impairing due process in student discipline cases in its notice-and-comment rulemaking to promulgate regulations to implement FERPA.[1600] The evidence and investigative report that is being shared under these final regulations directly relate to the allegations in a complaint and, thus, directly relate to both the complainant and respondent.

As explained earlier, the Department's interpretation in the 2001 Guidance still stands that ''if there is a direct conflict between requirements of FERPA and requirements of Title IX, such that enforcement of FERPA would interfere with the primary purpose of Title IX to eliminate sex-based discrimination in schools, the requirements of Title IX override any conflicting FERPA provisions.'' [1601]

Changes: None.

Comments: Several commenters suggested that the final regulations ought to model their FERPA language on the Clery Act regulations, namely 34 CFR 668.46(l), because the Clery Act regulations clearly state that compliance with the Clery Act does not violate FERPA but, commenters argued, proposed § 106.6(e) does not clearly assure recipients that complying with these Title IX regulations does not violate FERPA. Other commenters cited to 34 CFR 668.46(k)(3)(B)(3) and suggested that the final regulations should clearly state that medical records would not be released without the written authorization required in 45 CFR 164.508(b), implementing the Health Insurance Portability and Accountability Act of 1996 (''HIPAA''), Public Law 104–191, to mirror VAWA. In addition, commenters suggested that any release of medical records be consistent with 45 CFR 164.508(b), which is part of the Standards for Privacy of Individually Identifiable Health Information (''Privacy Rule'') adopted under HIPAA. Other commenters suggested that the Department require a data security standard benchmarked to HIPAA. This commenter stated that information about sexual assault may include medical information as sensitive Protected Health Information (PHI). Information about sexual history and abuse would be valuable to criminals and State adversaries. The commenter argued that because HIPAA is a known standard, familiar to technical support professionals, and has allowances for anonymization for research, using the data security standard as provided for in HIPAA will allow anonymized data for use in secure research that may inform policies and that absent a data security standard, information technology (IT) personnel will not be aware of any obligation to make sure that computers being used to create and store the sensitive information contained in evidence and investigative reports in Title IX grievance processes need to meet data security protocols.

Other commenters stated that even given these confines, FERPA's definition of ''directly related to'' is too broad. These commenters expressed concern that schools will get it wrong when trying to determine which evidence is directly related to certain allegations, which means that some highly sensitive student records will be produced, even when they should not be.

Other commenters disagreed, stating that the Department should add a sentence after the ''directly related to'' language that reads as or similar to the following: ''In determining whether evidence is 'directly related to the allegations obtained as part of the investigation,' the recipient must construe the phrase 'directly related to' broadly and in favor of production of any evidence obtained.''

[1601] 2001 Guidance at vii.

Discussion: The Department disagrees that it needs to adopt language in § 668.46(l) and expressly state that ''compliance [with these final regulations] does not constitute a violation of FERPA.'' The Department does not believe that there is any inherent conflict between these final regulations and FERPA. Additionally, these final regulations expressly state in § 106.6(e) that the obligation to comply with these final regulations ''is not obviated or alleviated by the FERPA statute, 20 U.S.C. 1232g or FERPA regulations, 34 CFR part 99.'' Such a statement sufficiently addresses concerns that compliance with these final regulations does not violate FERPA.

The Department does not enforce HIPAA, which protects the privacy and security of certain health information. The regulations, implementing HIPAA, which include the Privacy Rule and its provisions at 45 CFR 164.508(b), apply to ''covered entities,'' and a recipient may or may not be a covered entity. Accordingly, a recipient may not be required to comply with HIPAA, and the Department will not require recipients to comply with HIPAA through these final regulations. A recipient must comply with all laws that apply to it and is best positioned to determine whether and how HIPAA may apply to it. A recipient's grievance procedures and grievance process, which are required to be published pursuant to § 106.8(c), should provide notice to the parties that they will receive an equal opportunity to inspect and review any evidence obtained as part of an investigation that is directly related to the allegations raised in a formal complaint of sexual harassment. Indeed, § 106.8(c) requires the recipient to notify applicants for admission and employment, students, parents or legal guardians of elementary and secondary school students, employees, and all unions or professional organizations holding collective bargaining or professional agreements with the recipient notice of the recipient's grievance procedures and grievance process. If a party does not want the other party to receive any of the party's medical records, then the party (or the party's parent, if applicable) is not required to provide such medical records to the recipient as part of the investigation, nor to provide consent to the recipient with respect to medical and other treatment records for which a recipient is required to obtain voluntary, written consent before accessing or using such records, under § 106.45(b)(5)(i). Recipients do not have subpoena power, and as the commenter implies, a recipient will not be able to receive a party's medical records from a covered entity under the regulations implementing HIPAA without the party's consent.

The Department also does not wish to require that recipients use a data security standard benchmarked to HIPAA or its Privacy Rule because the Department does not administer HIPAA and does not wish to add yet another set of regulations governing the same type of information that HIPAA may cover. Recipients that are subject to both HIPAA and these final regulations would then be subject to two different sets of data security standards governing the same type of information, as the Department may interpret its data security provisions differently than other Federal agencies such as the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, which administers HIPAA. Although the Department encourages recipients to use secure data systems, Title IX does not directly concern data security, and the Department's proposed regulations did not directly address data security requirements.

The Department disagrees that ''directly related to'' is too broad or not broad enough. The Department purposefully chose ''directly related to,'' as such a requirement aligns with FERPA, and recipients that are subject to FERPA will understand how to apply such a requirement. The Department also acknowledges that recipients have discretion to determine what constitutes evidence directly related to the allegations in a formal complaint. The purpose of the provision in § 106.45(b)(5)(vi) is to give parties an opportunity to inspect, review, and respond to evidence that may be used to support or challenge allegations made in a formal complaint prior to the investigator's completion of the investigative report. The recipient certainly cannot exclude any evidence that the investigator intends to use in the investigative report.

Changes: None.

Comments: Several commenters had concerns about privacy with respect to the evidence-sharing provisions of the grievance procedures. Commenters stated, for instance, that only ''non-privileged'' materials ought to be shared during the process, and suggested that medical records ought to be considered privileged. Similarly, some commenters suggested that financial records of students should be considered privileged, and therefore not produced.

Commenters asserted that the final regulations should clarify that under no circumstances will a school access campus medical and counseling records. These records, stated commenters, would include the results of medical tests, rape kits, and forensic evidence that is covered by HIPAA and FERPA.

Discussion: Nothing in these final regulations requires a recipient to share materials subject to the attorney-client privilege in the recipient's possession with a party as part of a § 106.45 grievance process. If a party holds the attorney-client privilege and chooses to waive the privilege to share records protected by the attorney-client privilege, then the party may do so. To clarify this point, the Department added § 106.45(b)(1)(x) to expressly state that a recipient's grievance process must not: ''require, allow, rely upon, or otherwise use questions or evidence that constitute, or seek disclosure of, information protected under a legally recognized privilege, unless the person holding such privilege has waived the privilege.''

Medical records may be subject to other Federal and State laws that govern recipients, and recipients should comply with those laws. The Department believes that the final regulations, and specifically § 106.45(b)(5)(i), protect a party's records that are made or maintained by a physician, psychiatrist, psychologist, or other recognized professional or paraprofessional acting in the professional's or paraprofessional's capacity, or assisting in that capacity, and which are made and maintained in connection with the provision of treatment to the party. Pursuant to § 106.45(b)(5)(i), a recipient cannot access, consider, disclose or otherwise use such records unless the party gives the recipient voluntary, written consent.[1602] This restriction applies even where HIPAA or any State-law equivalent do not apply.

The Department does not wish to create more complexity and confusion by creating yet another set of regulations that apply to medical records by incorporating by reference HIPAA or attorney-client privilege rules. These final regulations, and specifically § 106.45(b)(1)(x) and § 106.45(b)(5)(i), appropriately protect medical records and attorney-client privileged information.

With respect to medical and counseling records to which a recipient does not have access, whether a recipient may access such medical and [1602] Pursuant to § 106.45(b)(5)(i), if the party is not an ''eligible student,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3, then the recipient must obtain the voluntary, written consent of a ''parent,'' as defined in 34 CFR 99.3. § 106.45(b)(5)(i).

counseling records would be governed by other laws that typically require a party's consent. A recipient should comply with all applicable laws governing medical and counseling records. For purposes of these final regulations, the recipient should not obtain as part of an investigation any evidence, directly relating to the allegations in a formal complaint, that cannot legally be shared with the parties.

Changes: The Department added § 106.45(b)(1)(x) to expressly state that a recipient's grievance process must not require, allow, rely upon, or otherwise use questions or evidence that constitute, or seek disclosure of, information protected under a legally recognized privilege, unless the person holding such privilege has waived the privilege.

Comments: Several commenters addressed the evidence-sharing provisions of the grievance procedures in other ways, stating that the final regulations ought to discourage schools from providing electronic access to documents. Many noted that students generally live close to the school itself, such that in-person access exclusively would likely be adequate, and would prevent the documents from being shared with outside parties or the press. Commenters also noted that electronic access may pose difficulties for students who lack a computer, or who lack internet access. Even for students who have access to these technologies, reliable access may not always be easily obtainable. Some might have to view evidence on a shared computer in a public library or a computer lab.

Some commenters contended that some students with disabilities would have difficulty accessing and reviewing all evidence in a digital format, particularly given how much material is likely to be produced under the final regulations. One commenter suggested limiting production to hard copy documents, unless the parties all agree to consent to electronic production as well. Some noted that hard copies of evidence will have to be made in many cases anyway, since those documents may need to be submitted as exhibits during the proceeding. Some commenters suggested not even providing the parties with the evidence, but instead just describing the evidence verbally, in the hopes of encouraging dialogue and discourse.

Some commenters asserted that the final regulations should only require supervised access to all material available to the decision-makers. Other commenters disagreed with the idea of only providing supervised hard-copy access to relevant documents, arguing that parties need private access to the documents, to be able to discuss information with their advisors. Some commenters asked the Department not to allow schools to give documents directly to party advisors, asserting that a party ought to have control over what they give to their own advisor.

Some commenters suggested that schools should have flexibility to provide information in the way they see fit, accounting for the expense of some technology. One commenter suggested that the final regulations should eliminate language that dictates the manner in which records will be shared, and instead state that the files should be shared ''in a manner that will prevent either party from copying, saving, or disseminating the records.''

Commenters contended that the time frames for providing evidence are too short, and therefore unduly burdensome for schools. These commenters argued that the ruling in Davis v. Monroe County Board of Education, 526 U.S. 629 (1999), provides schools and school administrators with flexibility and is not designed to make the process rigid and one-size-fits-all.

Discussion: The Department disagrees that parties should only be provided with hard copies of the evidence, as directly providing the parties with a hard copy of the evidence will prevent a recipient from being able to provide ''view only'' access, if the recipient would like to provide ''view only'' access. The Department also does not wish to require recipients to provide parties the opportunity only to inspect and review hard copies of the evidence because the parties may have obligations that prevent them from inspecting and reviewing the evidence during the hours when the recipient's operations are open to allow for such inspection and review. Nothing in these final regulations prevents a recipient from providing a hard copy of the evidence in addition to the evidence in an electronic format. Indeed, the Department revised § 106.45(b)(5)(vi)–(vii) to allow the recipient to provide a party and the party's advisor of choice with either a hard copy of the evidence and the investigative report or the evidence and the investigative report in an electronic format. Allowing the recipient to send the parties the evidence in an electronic format gives the recipient sufficient discretion to determine whether to use a file sharing platform that restricts the parties and advisors from downloading or copying the evidence, and the recipient also may opt to provide a hard copy of the evidence for the parties.[1603] The Department also fully encourages recipients to provide whatever reasonable accommodations are necessary for students with disabilities; recipients must comply with applicable disability laws while also complying with these final regulations. The Department also reiterates that a recipient may require parties to agree not to photograph or otherwise copy the evidence that the recipient provides for inspection and review. The Department also takes no position on nondisclosure agreements that comply with these final regulations. The Department, however, will not impose a uniform approach for recipients and would like recipients to have discretion in this regard. A recipient may choose to share records in a manner that will prevent either party from copying, saving, or disseminating the records, but the Department will not require the recipient to do so. Finally, the Department disagrees that describing the evidence verbally will provide the parties with a sufficient opportunity to respond to the evidence. Descriptions of evidence may not be accurate and even the best description will not always capture the nuances of the actual evidence.
